

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ### IRISH PEERAGE—MOTION FOR A JOINT ADDRESS—

Moved, That in case the House of Commons concur therein, the following humble Address be presented to Her Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign,
We, Your Majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to Your Majesty that a Select Committee of the House of Lords appointed in the last session of Parliament to consider the state of the Representative Peerage of Scotland and Ireland and the laws relating thereto, reported to the House of Lords their unanimous opinion as follows: “They are convinced that every addition to the Irish Peerage only increases and perpetuates the anomalous condition of that body; they would therefore trust that Her Majesty may be advised to renounce Her undoubted prerogative of creating Irish Peers, with a view to the modification of the 4th Article of Union.”

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE COUNT-OUT.—QUESTIONS.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had a Question to ask which had reference to the Count-out of last evening—namely, Whether the Government are prepared to offer any explanation with respect to it. The First Lord of the Treasury, in asking for a Morning Sitting, said he would undertake, so far as the Government were concerned, to make and keep a House. He desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman who represented the Government at that moment, whether they desire to offer any explanation of the repeated stoppage of business by Counts-out, especially that of last night?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON : In answer to the Question of the hon. Member I have to say that, so far as the Government were concerned on that occasion, they entirely carried out what they had promised to the House. They were in attendance, and I think the House will agree with me that, after the House was made, it rested entirely with the Members whether they felt sufficient interest in the proceedings to keep a House.

DR. KENEALY : As supplementary to that Question, and following the example of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), I beg respectfully to ask you, Mr. Speaker, By what hon. Member your attention was called to the fact that there were not 40 Members present?

MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Member for North Warwickshire asked me a Question recently as to who was the Member who noticed that 40 Members were not present. I stated to the hon. Member, in reply, that such a question was most unusual, and I expressly made use of that expression in the hope that such a Question would not be repeated. In saying that, I wish to state to the hon. Member for Stoke that I have no desire to make this answer in any spirit of discourtesy to that hon. Gentleman; but I think it important to prevent a practice which is new, and which might lead to great inconvenience. I have no doubt the hon. Member will be enabled to obtain the information from other sources.

DOMINION OF CANADA—EMIGRATION OF PAUPER CHILDREN.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to a letter which had appeared in "The Times," of that day signed by Mr. Andrew Doyle, who was sent out as an Inspector to Canada to inquire into the condition of the children who had emigrated, in which the writer stated that—

"He was not in a position at present to do more than to express an earnest hope that no Board of Guardians in the Kingdom would give ear to any proposal to send out another emigrant child till he should have had an opportunity of examining what appeared to him to be the partial and most unsatisfactory Report of the Canadian Government."

The Report referred to was not that of the Canadian Government, but of a Select Committee of the Canadian House of Commons, and he wished to ask, whether this letter has been written with the sanction of the Local Government Board, and if not whether it is usual to issue and publish such notices without reference to the higher official authorities?

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH, in reply, said, that Mr. Doyle's letter was written and sent to The Times on the writer's own responsibility, and carried with it no authority on the part of the Local Government Board. As a general rule, he certainly disapproved of Inspectors writing to newspapers; but this had been a very peculiar case, and several letters on the same subject, more or less of a personal and controversial character, had already been published.

PERMISSIVE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR BILL.

(Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir Thomas Bazley, Mr. Downing, Mr. Richard, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Dalway, Mr. William Johnstone.)

[BILL 19.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said: Mr. Speaker, in discharging the duty of proposing the rejection of this Bill, I am extremely anxious to avoid saying anything that could in the slightest degree hurt the feelings of any person, and I should indeed be extremely sorry if there was any question except one of principle between the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle and myself in this matter. It may be true, as has been asserted, that those who oppose my hon. Friend have no originality whatever. Well, I, at least, never made any claim to be considered an original. I leave that wholly and entirely to my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle himself. The reason why I make these observations is that, unless he has been grievously misreported, my hon. Friend said that so far as his opponents were concerned there was not the slightest degree of originality among them all. Well, I plead guilty to that charge so far as it regards myself; and with reference to those who agree with my course of action, I do not think it requires much originality when we find ourselves followed into the Division Lobby by nearly three-fifths of the House of Commons. This is a very ordinary matter indeed. It even seems to me that this Wednesday afternoon in the middle of June, and in the midst of the hot weather, is more to be spent in a summer afternoon's amusement than in anything else. If I did not perfectly well know that this is a foregone conclusion, I might really treat the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, with regard to his originality, as something at which I might be either ashamed or frightened, but I know the hon. Baronet too well. I know that he could not frighten me if he would, and that he would not frighten me if he could; and if he were to try it, I should be very much amused to see the result. So far as dealing with the question immediately before the House is concerned, I apprehend that the Permissive Bill tells its own tale and pleads its own cause infinitely more strongly than I can do; for it is self-condemned, and so far its condemnation is self-pronounced. I have not the least objection to my hon. Friend and his immensely long series of somewhat noisy followers abstaining from drink if they please, whether it is beer, spirits, or water. Let them by all means abstain. I would not ask them to take one glass of wine or one glass of beer; but I certainly would say to them—"If you please, as I do not interfere with you, do not you interfere with me. The rule which is good for you ought to be equally so for me. You like water; I like beer. You take your water, and stick to it by all means; but leave me, if I choose, in a position to stick to my beer." But I am told by some enthusiastic persons, look what a mass of Petitions has been presented to Parliament in favour of this Bill from all parts of England, from the north of Northumberland almost to the very south of the county of Cornwall. Well, and what then? We all know how Petitions are got up for express purposes, and sent here, not to tell the House what are the feelings of the country, but as pre-arranged by a large organization which is stated to have £100,000 at its disposal, a great part of which is said to be spent for the purpose of manufacturing Petitions. ["Oh, oh!"] I say, "manufacturing Petitions" advisedly; for let any person examine those Petitions and inquire as to the method by which the signatures were obtained. I venture to assert there is no hon. Member of this House who will not confess that they have been manufactured. Any person who chose to pay for it could get any number of signatures to any Petition; for those signatures cost nothing to those who append them, except indeed it be the outlay for pen and ink. But if it be asked, did the persons who signed act up to the doctrine preached; did they do themselves what they told somebody else to do? I would reply by simply saying—"Look to the Petition presented to-day from the Mayor and Master Cutler of the borough of Sheffield."

Now, I happen to know that, so far as the Master Cutler of Sheffield is concerned, every year he gives one of the most beautiful feasts that could be seen or accepted in the whole provinces of England. When I happily attended many times—and I hope to attend many more—I never saw a teetotal Master Cutler, and I never observed that there was not any wine on the table. When I am told—"Oh, we must set an example;" I reply—"Yes, by all means; but pray be good enough to practise what you preach, or, if you do not, then do not preach at all." Petitions, therefore, cannot be considered as a reflex of the real opinions and practices of those who sign them; and I mention this merely to show that very little stress can be rightly laid upon the number of Petitions presented. The Permissive Bill will not, and cannot, put an end to drunkenness, and it is absurd to legislate against drunkenness by Permissive Bills. To say because some people get drunk there should be no more intoxicating liquor sold is pretty much the same as though it were argued that because a murder had been committed with a knife you should put away knives altogether, and stop the cutlery trade entirely of Birmingham and Sheffield. We are told that this Permissive Bill is to deal with all our home and social questions in a way which I venture to think is neither desirable, useful, advantageous, just, nor fair to the community. We are told that if two-thirds of such number of the ratepayers of Sheffield or Leeds, as can be induced to trouble their heads about the matter in any way, attach their signatures to a prayer, merely saying, "Aye" or "No," then those two-thirds are to bind not only the remaining one-third or, indeed, the rest of the ratepayers, but all the inhabitants in the borough. That is a very neat proposition, which I fancy those who make it suppose will pass current, under the impression that ratepayers are inhabitants. Not a bit of it. The ratepayers are not all inhabitants. Why should two-thirds of the ratepayers be able to deprive the remaining third of their accustomed beverage; and not only so, but everyone else who resides within the borough? That is a monstrous proposition, and should be, I will not say thoroughly exposed, but, at all events, well understood by everybody who undertakes to advocate this Bill and consents to go into the Lobby with the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. The proposition would not be so objectionable if some provision were made to test the feeling of the whole of the inhabitants of a borough or district on the question, but there is no such provision. The whole matter is left in the hands of an alleged two-thirds of the ratepayers, and as we sometimes forget how much force may be brought to bear upon them, there need be no difficulty to get this so-called two-thirds of the ratepayers to declare in favour of the adoption of a permissive measure; but I consider it most unfair that they should have the power of dictating to the remaining one-third, and the whole of the non-rated inhabitants. But this is not by any means the worst feature of the Bill. By Clauses 8 and 9 you will find that, supposing there were any community so thoroughly unwise, unreasonable, and inconsequential as to endeavour by two-thirds of the ratepayers to make a prohibited district, they may keep that district in continual agitation, holding their meetings once a-year till they have attained their end, and when they have got the prohibition, they have the power to saddle the rest of the inhabitants with it for three years to come because of the objectionable nature of continuous agitation. Continuous agitation, no doubt, does a great amount of harm; but continuous agitation is, in this respect, much the same, whether carried on in favour of the Bill or against it—and you have only to look at the Petitions on the subject to judge of the kind of agitation that would be carried on if this Bill were to pass. Why, we have things rolled up here in the shape of Petitions so large as to remind me of those barrels of old which, crowned with a laureated image, were carried between two men at Roman feasts; and when I saw some of the Petitions that were brought to the Table to-day, I fancied they only wanted a little Bacchus at the top, with an Exeter Hall wand or bâton in his hand, to complete the picture. When I look at a Bill like the present, fraught with every possible bane that can affect humanity, brought in under the guise of a philanthropic notion, while those who support it leave themselves at perfect liberty to do as they please, at the same time that they seek to prohibit others from obtaining even moderate refreshment, it passes my comprehension to discover anything that can be said for it in reason or as a matter of common sense. Who made these people judges over me? What right have they to tell me whether, in accordance with the will of two-thirds of the ratepayers, or even by a majority of a single ratepayer, by 100,000, or by 1,000,000 ratepayers, that I am not to be at liberty to get a glass of beer if I see fit? Who made them governors over me or my personal conduct? They might just as well tell me that I should not buy a round hat, because the fashion of the day is to wear what is called a chimney pot. All these things are matters of social life and domestic arrangement, and if once you begin to interfere with what a man eats or drinks, you will lay down the principle of the right to interfere in all other social and private habits of life. Why any man is to tyrannize over my mind I do not understand, or why he should tell me it is wrong to do this or that I am at a loss to comprehend; but I do understand that the advocacy of those principles is invariably to be found in the mouths of those gentlemen who, on all other occasions, are pleading for the freedom of idea and liberty of conscience; but when it comes home to those gentlemen themselves there is no freedom of idea or liberty of conscience. They are the men who propose to give two-thirds of the ratepayers power to make the rest of their neighbourhood as uncomfortable as possible, and that without the slightest ground for supposing that any advantage whatever would be gained. If to-morrow you were to put the cordon of this Bill round any particular district, you would not stop the sale of liquor in the immediate outside circle. You would do no good by stopping that sale in a small place while you left the outside district free, for you may depend upon it there are districts that never can be brought within the action and operation of this Bill, and by putting this cordon round, you will do no more than send those who want to get drink into the non-prohibited district outside. These are matters which seem to be wholly unprovided for and unthought of by those who arranged the clauses of this Bill. We have heard much of some reserved localities. I do not know whether these are in Cumberland, but there is said to be one in Yorkshire where drink is not sold. There may not be public-houses within the limit of that district itself, but from intimate personal knowledge of the place I know there are a great many public-houses on the very edge of and all around it. But that is not the only matter. Do you think that when there is a prohibited district a man wishing to get something stronger than water to drink will have any difficulty? Are there no such places as chemists' shops or grocery establishments where the Wine Licensing Act has been brought into operation? Are there no places, whether licensed or not, where the want, or—if you so please to call it—the weakness, will be supplied? If you look England over, from Kent to Westmoreland—if you look even into Scotland—you will find that wherever there is a demand so there will be a supply. Like everything else, this is a question of supply and demand only. You may form what legislation you please; but if it is a question of what they shall eat or what they shall drink, men will not care for penal laws, but will set them at defiance. They will have what they want; and the worst thing you can do is to make that illicit and secret which is now open and above-board, and subject to regulations which are just and good. Commit no mistake in the matter. Is it right that that which is an open affair now should be so managed as to be put aside for secrecy? Mind, whatever you propose, drunkenness will go on, you may depend upon it, as before. It was said by an hon. Member of the House when he went into Maine, where it was thought that the Permissive Liquor Law is in full force, he found from end to end of the State people ready, able, and willing to set the law at defiance by selling liquor whenever and wherever it was asked for. I think it was the hon. Member for Derby told us that there were something like 2,000 arrests in one year for drunkenness in that State, and something like 1,200 or 1,500 other people—I presume above the class usually frequenting public-houses—who were sent to their homes in a state of intoxication without being arrested at all. Where was the drink obtained? We are told that the Maine Liquor Law has been a blessing to the State; but I think that the fewer blessings of that sort which the State obtains the better it will be for the State itself.

What is to be said for such a case where the people, though they did not drink openly and under regulation, drank secretly, and got so drunk as to be arrested for that offence at the rate of 2,000 a-year? That is what the Maine Liquor Law does in the country where it has the largest, the strongest—I do not like to say the fairest—trial, for no such trial can be justifiable. It is not the public-houses or the sale of intoxicating liquor which makes men drunk, but the capacity for getting drunk on the part of the men themselves, and all the legislation in creation will not stop a man from getting drunk if he chooses to do so. If it be said that nobody should have the opportunity of getting drunk, I beg to ask, how is it to be prevented? Parliament cannot prevent it if it would, and it would be wrong to do it if it could. The matter should be left to be governed by the reasonable habits and enjoyments of the people. I will say—"Do not legislate for one or for nine-tenths of the community as though they are drunkards. If you wish to legislate for drunkenness alone, do so by all means, but deal with them as you would with other criminals; if you catch them, and they have done wrong, punish them." Every man who is able to govern himself, and who is temperate enough to know when he has had as much beer or wine as is good for him, should be allowed to have that wine or beer. Are there in this House or out of it, except my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, half-a-dozen men who, whatever they might do in the way of signing Petitions, would hesitate here or elsewhere to take that glass of wine which is necessary and good for them? They may talk as much as they like and vote in any Lobby they please, but I want to know what they do in the Refreshment Room at the end of this building. How many of them sit down to a solid luncheon without also taking something liquid, which is not water? These are practical views and practical tests, and when I find nothing but glass tumblers and water bottles ranged on the tables of our House of Commons Refreshment Room, I will believe in the practice, though I do not believe in its utility or good. Am I to be prohibited the liberty of going into a club between this and St. James's Street and having a glass of wine? Why should I be asked to legislate so as to leave me at perfect liberty to go into the Refreshment Room here, or any refreshment room between here and St. James's Street, while I tell the inhabitants of St. Martin's Lane that they shall not get that which I am able to get at my club. The public-house is the poor man's cellar. Do you think for a moment that the poor man can give an order to a brewer or wine merchant to stock his cellar? He more often lives in a cellar than is able to stock it with wine, and I object to that man being prohibited from getting his glass of beer when I am to be at liberty to get what I like, when I like, at my club. The principle of your legislation should be that it is right and just to deal with every class of man as if he were a freeman, with all his senses about him, and as well able to judge of his requirements as any of us; and I never will consent under any state of circumstances to deprive the labouring man of the very few bodily comforts he has, until the Legislature deprives me also. Do not tell me that because I do not enter a public-house I cannot get what I want anywhere else. But the public-house is the working man's club. It is there that he goes for his social requirements. I know it is said that we may have public-houses without drink; but I am not to be compelled to go for refreshments to a place where nothing but water is sold, because such places are considered useful for those who are unable to control their own wants or their own vices. Let those who desire it go to temperance houses, which I only wish were always as temperate in their management as their name would imply. But, again I say, whatever you do with regard to your own ideas and your own wants, leave me to follow the bent of my own inclination. The Preamble of this Bill says—

"Whereas the common sale of intoxicating liquors is a fruitful source of crime, immorality, pauperism, disease, insanity, and premature death, whereby not only the individuals who give way to drinking habits are plunged into misery, but grievous wrong is done to the persons and property of Her Majesty's subjects at large, and public rates and taxes are greatly augmented"— getting from the philosophical to the practical at a jump—

"and whereas it is expedient to confer upon cities, boroughs, parishes, and townships power to prohibit the common sale aforesaid, be it enacted," &c.

I contend that it is not the common sale, but the actual and immoderate use of intoxicants that produces immorality. If the hon. Member for Carlisle intends by this Bill to make a raid upon public-houses, brewers, and distillers, he should say so in the Bill. It will have that effect in certain little boroughs where the majority of the people do not want to have them; but if in a large borough—as, for instance, the borough I represent—two-thirds of the ratepayers could by any accident be supposed some fine morning to have determined in favour of the Permissive Bill, I should like to know what the rest of the inhabitants would say? I fancy that it would not be very palatable to them, and that it would not do. Leeds would not have it. Certainly not; and if the prohibition were in some way obtained, they would take the earliest opportunity to remove it. The Bill, it is said, is not intended for us highly-respectable people, against whom there is no allegation leading to the inference that we would do wrong, but for a different class of people altogether. It is for a class who cannot govern themselves, and it is promoted also in the interest of those who live in the neighbourhood of that class. We are told that we must legislate so as to provide against every possible chance of leading our neighbour into temptation. So say I, where the temptation is a positive breach of the law, so far as the individual is concerned; but if we are to begin legislating against leading men into temptation by the example of other men's conduct, you would have a great deal more to do than this House could manage in any number of centuries. We are told that in one particular district there is no drink-shop at all, that there is no brewery, and that a distillery is altogether out of the question. Another hon. Member of this House has made some inquiry with regard to that blessed locality. I have done so myself—and I know very much of the district—but the results I obtained with my preconceived bias on the subject would not, perhaps, be received with much weight. But the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple has made an investigation—in the first instance, by a visit to the spot, and afterwards by endeavouring to arrive at the truth from an independent source—and he found that in the very heart of the district he had not the slightest difficulty in getting anything he wanted to drink. Theorising might be all very well, but that was the practical view of the subject. I hold in my hand a little tract published by Mr. Wilson Turnbull, of Norwich, which puts under nine heads all the objections to the Permissive Bill, which seem to dispose of all argument on the matter: these objections being, that it is in conflict with the fundamental canons of English jurisprudence; that it is utterly indefensible in principle; that it could not be enforced, and cannot be worked favourably under any state of circumstances in England or elsewhere; that it would not operate uniformly on all the several classes of society; that it would be productive of greater evil than it removed; that all legislation was illogical which forbade the sale of liquors but permitted the manufacture; that all legislation was illogical which suppressed public drinking and did not at the same time suppress private drinking; that in directing their efforts against the sale of liquor and not against its use, the supporters of the Permissive Bill had not the courage of their opinions; and that public-houses could be permanently removed only by removing the demand for them, since they are not at all the cause of drinking habits, but the consequences of them. Surely it ought to be an answer to any attempt at legislation of this kind that, however much we may desire to prohibit the manufacture in this country or the importation of beer, wine, or spirits, you cannot do so. The importation is actually arranged for by the Excise laws; but until you stop it you can do nothing in the matter except that which will be unjust and unfair to certain classes. No doubt my hon. Friend would desire to prevent the importation of a single drop of wine, but he will find England too strong for him. If this Bill were carried out to-morrow, not only would there be illicit and illegal drinking, but in some place, where land is tolerably cheap, you would have enormous distilleries, enormous breweries, and enormous stores of malt and hops, forming a sort of citadel which would be strong enough to repel all the assaults of teetotalism. But even supposing you could prevent that, does my hon. Friend suppose that the want would not be supplied from abroad? Burton-on-Trent, it is said, sends out beer to India and elsewhere in very large quantities; and if you interfere with the large brewers and distillers, what is to prevent any man from building a brewery or a distillery just out of the limits of the country and sending us as much as we want? If there were a cordon of police and revenue cutters all round the shores of Great Britain, men would get what they thought they needed for eating or drinking in spite of all the prohibitory laws in creation. Where drink is prohibited, I do not know whether they do not import opium; but that is one result that we might anticipate. Men would get drink on the sly if they could not get it openly, and that which is now done under the control of public opinion and legislative enactment would have to be suppressed, if it were suppressed, by a strong hand such as would create, if not a rebellion, at least a revolution in England. This is no new thing. It was tried a long time ago, in the 9th George II., by which Act the Legislature endeavoured to prohibit spirit drinking in England; but that Act, which was passed in 1741, caused such an outcry throughout the length and breadth of the land as an attempt at class legislation, that in two years Parliament was compelled reluctantly to give it up. Something of the same kind was tried not long ago with regard to England by a proposal similar to the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland, but the people would not have it. This Permissive Bill is neither a rational nor a national mode of dealing with a question of this kind. It is, after all, a working man's question. Why should a labouring man working at the docks be compelled, because he happened to be in a prohibited district, to go a mile and a-half to get a glass of beer? Is there any sense or reason in such a proposition? Let hon. Gentlemen who are opposed to drinking do all they can to carry out their views in any way short of actual coercion. This Bill is an attempt at coercion. I am not to be influenced by the large number of Petitions presented in favour of this Bill, for I know how easy it is to obtain signatures. I am perfectly unimpressible—if you like, perfectly irrepressible—in matters of this kind; but I certainly will protest against any attempt at legislation by which the poor man's right is invaded, or where Bills are sought to be introduced into Parliament for the purpose of legislating for one class of men at the expense of another. Put us all on the same footing. Leave us to decide as to our own wants, or, if you please, our own weaknesses; and if there is a necessity for such a measure as this, let it not be the work of amateur legislation, but let it be introduced upon the responsibility of the Government. We shall know exactly how to deal with any Treasury Bench that sets itself to work upon an operation of this kind. Under the circumstances in which I am placed my duty on this occasion is a very easy one. It is one about which there will be no mistake when we come to a division, and it now only remains for me to move that instead of this Bill being read a second time to-day, it be read a second time this day three months.

Mr. GOLDSMID, in seconding the Amendment, said, he wished to remind the House that last Session he pointed out that the practice of the hon. Baronet was not entirely in accordance with his teaching in this matter, and the hon. Baronet objected to such a reference to what he ate and drank. His (Mr. Goldsmid's) only object, however, had been to show that if a man made his private life accord with his public utterances, he would have more weight with the people of this country than if he did not do so. If report spoke truly, upon that point, at least, the hon. Baronet had reformed his ways; because it was rumoured that at a banquet held in honour of the "thorough good beating" the Bill received last year, no drink stronger than ginger beer was allowed to the guests on that occasion. He begged to congratulate the hon. Baronet on having had in this respect "the courage of his opinion." The hon. Baronet had on more than one occasion said that this Bill was the only true remedy against drunkenness; but he (Mr. Goldsmid) believed that to be a great mistake. It had been said that all who supported the Bill were in favour of the public, and that all who opposed it were in favour of the publicans. Now, that might be very good in theory, but it was not true as a matter of fact, because very many opponents of this Bill had no connection whatever with the publicans, their wish being not to interfere with the reasonable liberties of the subject. The hon. Baronet argued that drunkenness was increasing; but that was not supported by figures, which showed that in proportion to the increase in the population drunkenness was on the decrease. Last year he (Mr. Gold-smid) quoted some statistics showing that repressive legislation failed of its object, and this year he would refer to the opinion of Mr. Murray, British Consul in the State of Maine, United States, in reference to the Maine Liquor Law. That gentleman said—

"A long residence of nearly 14 years in this State has given me unusual opportunities for studying this question, and I have no hesitation in re-affirming that, with the exception of some isolated villages, the Maine Prohibition Law has been a failure in the large towns and cities."

Any good it might have effected was more than counterbalanced, he thought, by

"The hypocrisy and demoralization of a very large class, who, though nominally political abolitionists, are not consistent in their own conduct;"

and he illustrated his observation by taking the cases of committal to prison for offences from the 1st of March to the 31st of December. In that time in the town of Portland, with a population not exceeding 30,000, there were 2,628 arrests for all crimes, and of that number 2,200 were for drunkenness. Thus it was shown that in the city where the Maine Liquor Law prevailed, the great bulk of the offenders were committed for drunkenness. Still the hon. Baronet said that legislation of that kind would produce sobriety in the country. He (Mr. Goldsmid) denied that. Not many years ago it was a common thing to see a gentleman drunk in a private house; but public opinion and education had induced them now to consider that it was not a proper thing to take too much drink; and he believed that feeling was now prevalent, not only among the classes to which he referred, but also among the working classes of the country. He had seen a great deal of the working classes, and he believed that drunkenness among the educated working men was not now more prevalent than it was among the educated gentlemen, and that in proportion as education extended downwards it would disappear without the necessity of any such legislation as now proposed. One of his strong objections to the Bill of the hon. Baronet was its so-called "permissive" character. It was in reality eminently tyrannical. Take the 8th and 9th clauses, for instance—the supporters of this Bill might renew the agitation year by year; but if once successful, its opponents were not allowed to obtain its repeal until after the expiration of three years. Again, the power of shutting up public-houses was to be vested in a two-thirds majority of the ratepayers. Well, assuming that the ratepayers formed one-fifth of the population—and that was a liberal estimate—something like two-fifteenths of the inhabitants of a district, many of whom, perhaps, had cellars of their own, would have in their hands the power of preventing the other thirteen-fifteenths from purchasing any liquor. Surely, that was not a proposition which the House could seriously entertain. It seemed to him very wrong for the House of Commons to remit a question to be discussed and fought over in every parish in England which they had not the courage to decide themselves. If it was right to prohibit the sale of strong drink, let the House of Commons prohibit it; but do not let them adopt this cowardly mode of action. It was supposed the Bill would have a beneficial effect by removing temptation to drunkenness. To the great mass of the people, however, drink offered no temptation; and that even for those to whom it was, it was not desirable or wise to adopt this course, but rather moral means of persuasion. The best way of reforming drunkards was to bring home to them the necessity of restraining their appetites, and following the example set them by the hon. Baronet and his friends. The numbers in the division of last year on the hon. Baronet's Bill were very significant—namely, 75 Members voted for the Bill, and 301 against it; in other words, the hon. Baronet was beaten by 4 to 1. He (Mr. Goldsmid) wanted to know, under those circumstances, how it came that the hon. Baronet boasted that he had a satisfactory division on that occasion, and that of all the political parties of the last Parliament who came to grief at the last General Election, he alone had survived? Well, it appeared that he had survived by obtaining one more supporter than he formerly had, and that was the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed). Now, that was a fact on which he could hardly fairly congratulate himself, as that hon. Member had expressly stated that he was opposed to nearly all the principles contained in the Bill, and only supported the second reading because he thought that nearly all the clauses would be altered in Committee. He therefore did not think the hon. Baronet had much to boast of in having succeeded in obtaining this additional supporter. The fact was, that notwithstanding the years of agitation and the expenditure of large sums of money and labour, the hon. Baronet was still in that minority, had only been able to obtain one additional supporter to his Parliamentary crotchet; and if he went on in the future at the same rate he would have to live to the age of Methuselah, or longer, before he succeeded in gaining his objects. If it passed, in the present state of public opinion the Bill would be a perfect nullity, or if it were acted upon at all, the people of England would resist its enforcement. He was sure the House of Commons did not wish to legislate for the purpose of creating disturbance on the one hand, nor of adding to the enormous preponderance of votes at General Elections against the feelings of the majority for Representatives of the People. The hon. Baronet put an enormous number of names of Members of Parliament on the back of the Bill; but he (Mr. Goldsmid) wished to know whether every hon. Member who endorsed the Bill had read it? He thought that if they had done so, and had any experience of what Acts of Parliament ought to be, they would have regarded the measure as very crude. He thought the Bill, if enacted, would lead to very lawless results. He thought the hon. Baronet had endeavoured to instil into the measure a principle repugnant to the feelings of the people—a principle which would certainly stir up strife in every locality where the Act would come into operation. He thought there was evidently a lack of courage on the part of the hon. Baronet, and his supporters in not acting up to what their principles demanded, for if he and they wished to object to the sale of intoxicating liquor, the fairest course for him to adopt was to bring in a Bill for the purpose. He (Mr. Goldsmid) was a diligent reader, and had seen a speech of the hon. Baronet in which he boasted that he had the Pope and a Cardinal on his side, and he added that the vice of drunkenness could not be eradicated until we stopped the sale of intoxicating liquors. To be consistent, then, he should bring in a Bill for that purpose. The hon. Baronet, on another occasion, said he did not much care about what had occurred in America in reference to the liquor traffic, and when invited to America, he shirked the invitation; but, whether he made that journey or not, he (Mr. Goldsmid) might safely say that if it were not for the popularity which he had won by the gay gravity and humorous folly with which he had diverted his hearers, the House of Commons would long since have shrunk from him and been sick of the Bill. No one without those agreeable qualities would be tolerated in taking up, in the latter period of the Session, the valuable time of the House, when important measures were awaiting discussion. It was therefore to be regretted that the plans of refusing to allow measures to be introduced was not now so generally acted upon as it used to be, for if the present measure had been rejected in that way, some valuable time would be saved. The whole of the agitation on behalf of the Bill had been got up by paid agents all over the country, and Petitions were manufactured for the purpose of making an impression that the public were favourable to the movement. One of those Petitions insinuated that those who were favourable to the Permissive Bill were entitled to a monopoly of legislation, as they acted for the highest ends. Before sitting down, he would ask the hon. Baronet whether he thought he was doing what was best for the country in occupying the valuable time of the House in the discussion of this question when much practical legislation was awaiting the consideration of the House? Would it not be better to allow the practical business which had a probability in its favour, and which must be considered before the Prorogation, to be dealt with, instead of occupying the time with a measure whose supporters were constantly diminishing? He would venture to urge on the hon. Baronet the propriety of reconsidering his position, and that he should not continue year and year to inflict on the House a Bill which there was no prospect of passing.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MR. CARTER: Sir, my hon. and learned Colleague the Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) has filled such a very large part of the picture in to-day's discussion upon the question which is before the House that I feel I should be scarcely doing my duty if I did not seek to occupy some small part of that picture myself. Although I may not be brought out in such colours and with such prominence as my hon. and learned Colleague, and though I may not be placed with exactly the same Party as he is, I wish to make a few observations in reference to this Bill, and, in doing so, I must ask that indulgence of the House which is usually offered to those who address it for the first time. I have ever found the House to be exceedingly indulgent, and to give to every Member—even though he may not have the ability of expressing his views in the best possible language, or with the greatest amount of plainness—the fullest opportunity of expressing his views. I wish most heartily I had the confidence and the nerve of the two Gentlemen who have already addressed us on this subject—namely, my hon. and learned Colleague, and the hon. Member below me who has talked to the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle like a father. I, however, thought that although these remarks might have been made by anyone representing Her Majesty's Government, they were scarcely in their place coming from the hon. Member for Rochester. I wish to take exception to two or three remarks which have been made by my hon. and learned Colleague. At the commencement of his speech he said he was not an original. I believe he is the only person in the House who would venture to give that opinion. I am sure there is not another hon. Gentleman in this House who could have made the speech that we have listened to; and I shall, Sir, before I sit down, have an opportunity of referring to another speech which the hon. and learned Gentleman made in another place, which I believe no other Gentleman in this House could have made but my hon. and learned Colleague. Sir, it is not my intention to discuss at length the principle of the Bill—I mean its main or leading principle—the prohibitory principle. Neither do I intend, Sir, to follow my hon. and learned Colleague through the arguments that he has used in opposition to the Bill. His arguments are neither new nor more weighty than when they were brought forward years since, and they have been most successfully replied to by Gentlemen who have followed him in previous years. Ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I have invariably supported my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle on this Bill, not because I agree with him entirely in reference to its prohibitory principle, but because I am anxious that the whole question of licensing and regulating the liquor traffic should be referred to the people—and decided by them rather than decided by a bench of magistrates, or by any committee appointed by the ratepayers. The hon. Gentleman who has spoken last has argued as if the Permissive Bill party in the country were afraid to relegate this question to the people. Now, I think that is a matter of detail, and I should be quite ready, if the Bill comes into Committee, to move that this matter shall be referred to the inhabitants rather than the ratepayers; and I have far more confidence that the great mass of the people would be in favour of this Bill than the higher classes. Sir, I believe the hon. Baronet has no idea of being successful to-day. Is it any reason that he will not be successful in future years because he has only one-fourth of the House with him to-day. My hon. and learned Colleague put it on that ground. He said—"Look, you have only a quarter of the House voting with you on this question!" But what great question has ever been carried through this House that has not been opposed and defeated by great majorities at first? What was the case with the Motions for the repeal of the Corn Laws and the Reform Bill of 1832? And this was the case when my late hon. Colleague (Mr. Baines) brought forward his Reform Bill. He had a few followers; but in a very few years the Bill got a large number of supporters, and in time was passed into law. My hon. Friend who spoke on the bench below me (Mr. Goldsmid) said that very great improvements had taken place in regard to drunkenness, that the higher classes drank far less than formerly, and that the working classes drank far less than formerly. Admitted. But who has brought about this improvement in reference to both the higher and the lower classes? I believe that it has been brought about entirely by the advocacy of temperance principles—by Gentlemen like the hon. Member for Carlisle. It has been the general discussion on temperance, and the evils which attend drunkenness, which has led to this improved feeling in the country. Sir, I very much dispute whether we should have had the Licensing Bills which have been before us in the last four or five years, if it had not been for the agitation out-of-doors. If we had no Permissive Bill Association, no United Kingdom Alliance, I question whether we should have had the Bill which was introduced by Lord Aberdare. A very short time ago, little regard was paid to the number of licences issued in different districts. They were issued in numbers without the slightest regard to the influence they were likely to produce on the morals of the people. A short time ago a publican could keep his house open at all hours, both night and day. Now we have a prohibitory liquor law for several hours in the 24. Formerly, he could supply drink to children and to drunken people. He cannot do so now without rendering himself liable to a penalty. It is almost universally admitted that the publican's is a dangerous trade, and in consequence of its being a dangerous trade liable to abuse, it has come to be understood that no man can take up that trade except he is of good character. In former times, rogues and people of bad character have got licences by the dozen. Now, Sir, there has been a great alteration in this respect. And why? Simply because there has been discussion out-of-doors in regard to this matter, and that discussion has forced Her Majesty's Government to look at the question, and see what improvements could be made in the licensing system, with a view of removing the disgrace, and, as far as possible, the immorality which is attendant upon the drink traffic. Now, my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Wheelhouse) has argued this question as if any limit whatever was tyranny. Now that argument, if of any weight whatever, should go to the removal of all restrictions, and ought to go to the removal of all licences, and leave a free and open trade, without any restrictions whatever. But we are not prepared to do that. It comes to this. It is simply a question of what amount of restriction is to be put upon this trade. In the circular issued by the licensed victuallers, the conduct of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle and those who advocate this cause, is denounced as unhealthy and venal. I think these are very strong terms to use in reference to the advocacy of a number of people who can have no interest in the matter whatever, excepting the good of the people. They also say this in this circular—that there ought not to be opposition—such opposition as is allowed in this House—because they are a legally recognized body, and it is a legally recognized trade. But why is this trade legally recognized? Because of its danger, because of the evil of its influence on society. And I believe the only question between us—those who are opposed to this Bill and those that are in favour of it—is, how far these restrictions should extend? My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle simply proposes that you should give the inhabitants or rate-payers of any district in the Kingdom the power of entirely prohibiting this trade, that they may be free from the evils which are consequent to it. Sir, the Gentlemen who oppose this Bill—not, of course, the majority of the House—are alarmed at the idea of the poor man losing his beer. That is a strong argument with my hon. and learned Colleague. I have had the opportunity of mixing extensively among the working classes for the last 25 years, and I have often had the opportunity of putting this question to them, and I have never found any serious opposition at any meeting I have attended against the adoption of the prohibitory principle where a large majority of the inhabitants of a district were willing to adopt it. Sir, if the feeling among the working classes is anything like as strong as has been represented by the two hon. Gentlemen who have spoken, why have they such a fear and dread of this Bill? And why should a large number of gentlemen connected with the licensed victuallers come up here, and lobby Members, in order to throw out this Bill? Sir, there is a great amount of false sentiment in these arguments with regard to the working man and his beer. Where beer enters into consumption with the meals, as it does in London, it might be a hardship to deprive the people of it. It might be difficult, and it would be impossible, I should say, to put this Bill into operation in such places. But does it follow that because you cannot remove an evil in London, you should not try to remove it anywhere else? My argument is, that where people are prepared to submit to this Bill, you should give them the opportunity of submitting. In most northern towns it is by no means the rule, but the exception to send out for beer with the meals, and it would be very little hardship to the northern population if this law was put into force. Now, Sir, I spent the early part of my life as an agricultural labourer, and it was not until I arrived at manhood that I entered a large town. There was not a public-house within three or four miles of the place where I spent the early portion of my life. But I do not know a more vigorous lot of men in the world than the men who inhabit that district. They do not see or taste drink from month's end to month's end, and yet they are some of the most vigorous working men in the Kingdom. Since then I have spent something like 25 or 30 years of my life at a large workshop, and had for many years of my life the conduct and direction of a large number of men, and I can say without the slightest hesitation that it would be very little hardship indeed to the great mass of the working classes to be compelled to do without the kind of stuff that is sold in public-houses. I am not speaking as a teetotaler; but I am speaking, Sir, as having had a considerable amount of experience in managing and directing men, and I say without the slightest hesitation that drink is idle. And if you allow working-men to have drink during the time they are at their labour, it is a great disadvantage both to the man and to the master. And I know that in some of the best workshops in the Kingdom there is a prohibitory law that no man shall either bring in or send for drink into the workshops during the working hours. Sir, I admit that if this prohibitory law was to come into operation to-morrow, that the minority might be put to considerable inconvenience, and that they might have to make a considerable amount of self-sacrifice. But that is only what we are called upon to do every day of our lives, and nearly all the laws that we pass in this House in some way or another effect the liberties of the people. I think, in discussing questions of this kind, we ought to consider the object as well as the rules which we lay down. A short time since we had a discussion on a Coercion Bill, and hon. Gentlemen who object so strongly to coerce people in regard to drinking, have no scruples whatever with regard to coercing the people of Westmeath. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen smile as if there was no parallel between the two cases. Well, you call upon the respectable and well-conducted inhabitants of Westmeath to deprive themselves of a number of privileges. And why? Because there are a few outrages and murders in Westmeath. Why, Sir, hundreds of outrages and murders take place in this country in consequence of drink, and yet hon. Gentlemen laugh when I want to draw a parallel between the two cases. Sir, the licensed victuallers in their circular say that the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle are venal. I say that the arguments used on the other side in this case are not patriotic, and are not such as we should put into very great prominence either in our speeches or in our legislation. I have always been given to understand that it was noble, and great, and good to make sacrifices. But the arguments are just the opposite that have been directed against this Bill. We are told that to make people sober by Act of Parliament is to tyrannize over them. Sir, I wish to make two or three remarks in regard to the opposition of my hon. and learned Colleague. Just allow me to say, first, that I have found by experience that there are two classes of working men, the provident and the improvident. The provident man will be able to supply himself with beer or drink, if this Bill passes, just as well as the better-class man supplies himself now, and he will not be entirely deprived of beer. And if beer is such a capital thing, why not let the family have some of it as well as the individual who fetches it himself from the public-house? The arguments have not been brought forward to-day by either of the two hon. Gentlemen who have spoken, that the clubs in Pall Mall would supply the higher classes with everything they require, while the lower classes would be deprived of beer and spirits. I have yet to learn that the clubs in Pall Mall have any monopoly in club law. I believe the working classes have their clubs as well as the higher classes, and I believe there is no disposition to apply any laws to working men's clubs that are not applied with equal severity to the higher clubs. My opinion is, that if this Bill passed we should have more working men's clubs, where men could amuse themselves without having the publican coming in and reminding them to have something for the good of the house. Would not that be better for them than to have a constable coming in, as he very often does into a public-house, to warn those present that the hour is getting late, and that they had better retire to their homes? I am sorry my hon. and learned Colleague is absent from the House; for simple-minded people have the impression, and they express it pretty loudly sometimes in my hearing, that it is a disagreeable task to move peremptorily the rejection of this Bill, and that my hon. and learned Colleague would not take the course he does in regard to it if some very strong pressure was not brought to bear upon him to compel him to do so. That he does so, however, from the best and most generous of notions and the purest intentions I have not the slightest doubt. Now, I did hear that my hon. and learned Colleague had shrunk from the duty, and somebody else had been found to do it. But that was not to-day the case, for my hon. and learned Friend turned up and fought the battle as nobly and energetically as ever he did. I did hope that there was some truth in another report that I read in one of the newspapers—that my hon. and learned Colleague had turned teetotaler, and that he was going to join my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle. I fear, however, that report is not correct. But what does the inference that simple-minded people, of whom I have spoken, draw amount to? It amounts to this—that the great mass of the people of Leeds—his and my constituents—are in favour of opposing this Bill to limit the influence of the drink trade! Whenever there is a question of this kind before the House my hon. and learned Colleague draws his sword, and rushes to the front of the battle in favour of the drink interest. I do not want to give offence to him, but I entirely deny the inference is correct, for the last grand jury at Leeds made a presentment to the learned Judge who presided at the Assizes, deploring the evils of the existing system, and they asked the learned gentleman to forward it to the Home Office. My hon. and learned Friend will, I think, hardly be surprised if I take this opportunity of reading a few extracts from a speech which he delivered in November last. Sir, I claim for my constituents that they stand in the front rank of those who seek the welfare and improvement of the masses of the people, and it would be alien to their character and to their nature if they did not offer uncompromising opposition to the liquor traffic. I speak strongly on this question, because I have received so many protests against the conduct of my hon. and learned Colleague; and, Sir, I am sorry to say that his conduct is having its effects in other parts of the country. The people of Leeds are undoubtedly taking a leading part in the endeavour to put restrictions on the use of drink, and my hon. and learned Colleague, in the course he has adopted in this House, never dares to say that he speaks in the name of his constituents, or of the mass of the intelligent working men of the country. In this matter—the drink trade—my hon. and learned Colleague must be considered far more as the representative of the licensed victuallers of Leeds than as the representative of the mass of the intelligent working men of the borough. Sir, I said that the conduct of my hon. and learned Colleague was affecting the character of the borough, and so it has, in a way of which he is probably not aware. A few days ago a meeting was held at Grimsby, Yorkshire; and at that meeting the following question was discussed—"Shall Leeds be honoured by having the next conference held there?" and the argument against the meeting being held there was that Leeds had become demoralized; and had taken the lead in advocating the most demoralizing trade in the world. The proposition was carried against Leeds. The speech of my hon. and learned Colleague to which I have alluded was delivered on the 9th of November, 1874. He had been dining with the members of the Licensed Victuallers' Association at Leeds; and at that meeting he made use of these words—"There are few occasions on which I am so happy"—the hon. and learned Gentleman is proud of his position, and you will see directly that he is proud of his connection with the licensed victuallers. "There are few occasions," he says, "on which I am so happy, and scarcely any on which I feel more in my place than in coming to the dinners of the Licensed Victuallers' Association." My hon. and learned Friend then goes on to say—

"I never can forget, and I never will forget, how much I owe to those who were the Licensed Victuallers' Association, and the managers of it when first I came into Parliament for the borough of Leeds. Without saying that I owe all to them, I owe perhaps as much to them—and I am proud to acknowledge it—as any man in Parliament ever owed to any constituency, be it large or be it small."

My hon. and learned Friend says—"Without saying that I owe all to them (that is, the Licensed Victuallers' Association) I owe as much to them as any man in Parliament ever owed to his constituency." That is the fair meaning of the words I have read. Let us analyze them a little further. We all owe everything to our constituencies for sending us here; and my hon. and learned Friend cannot owe more to his constituents than we owe to ours. But is not this the inference which we may fairly draw from what he says—namely, that he owes to those gentlemen—the licensed victuallers—everything for sending him to Parliament in 1868. If that be the case, then it must largely detract from the value of the opposition which the hon. and learned Gentleman has made to the Bill; because, if he is indebted to the licensed victuallers for everything, then he is bound in gratitude to oppose this Bill. I call this "The extraordinary confession of the hon. and learned Gentleman." I must, however, say that this confession did not much surprise the constituency of Leeds, but it created a vast amount of sympathy for the hon. and learned Gentleman; sympathy, because it was felt to be a very great misfortune for the hon. and learned Gentleman that he was unable to attend any dinner-parties which gave him such great pleasure as these dinner-parties of the Licensed Victuallers' Association; it was felt to be a great misfortune that the hon. and learned Gentleman could find himself nowhere so much at home as at the dinner of the Licensed Victuallers' Association. Sir, may I express the hope that in the future the hon. and learned Gentleman will be able to find other dinner-parties which will afford him much more pleasure, and other society where he will find himself quite as much at home as at the dinner parties of the Licensed Victuallers' Association of Leeds? I am told that this meeting of which my hon. and learned Colleague was so proud broke up in something like confusion and disorder, in consequence of the state of excitement to which many of those present had been brought by the drink and extraordinary speech which my hon. and learned Friend then made. I am told that some other hon. Members who were present could not get a hearing in consequence of the excitement that prevailed. I have never attended any of the dinners of the Licensed Victuallers' Association—[An hon. MEMBER: Because you were never invited.]—but I have always been under the impression, that, though the dinners might be very good, the company was not such as a well-educated and learned man would find pleasure in, and feel most at home in. There were several hon. Members in this House who considered it consistent with their duty to go there; some hon. Members no doubt consider that they are under some obligations to the gentlemen—the licensed victuallers—and that it is their duty from time to time to meet them and thank them for the support which they have given them during Parliamentary election contests; but I never heard from anyone of the hon. Gentlemen who attended these dinners that the company were of a very intellectual order, or such as learned Gentlemen would be quite at home at. On the contrary, I fancy that the general experience is, that they come away sadder if not wiser men, and feeling that they would have been very much happier if they had remained at home. Nothing can be more touching than the expression of gratitude of my hon. and learned Friend—“I will never forget you; I never can forget how much I am indebted to you.” Now, I would ask this House if it is not under a sense of obligation to these gentlemen that my hon. and learned Friend always comes to the forefront of the battle whenever this matter comes before the House. He tells you himself that he is under deep obligations to these men; and for that reason he champions their cause not only to-day, but on every occasion when their interests are brought before the House. I will only detain the House for a few moments whilst I allude to two or three matters connected with my own borough. My hon. and learned Colleague informed the House that he despised all Petitions which were presented to Parliament in favour of the Permissive Bill which were got up by the United Kingdom Alliance. These Petitions are got up, Sir, by purely voluntary effort, and are fruits of noble and generous acts. If the House is asked not to regard these Petitions, then I ask the House not to pay any attention to my hon. and learned Friend, for by his own acknowledgment he is sent here by men directly interested in the liquor traffic. In 1868 two gentlemen were before the constituency of Leeds—one a teetotaler, and the other a Permissive Bill man. The Licensed Victuallers' Association did their best to prevent these men from being returned, and they selected my hon. and learned Colleague to be their advocate, but the two temperance men were returned by a majority of 5,000 over my hon. and learned Friend. In the election of 1874 my late hon. Colleague (Mr. Baines) lost his election, and why? Because he supported my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle? No, but because for the first time in his life he refused to give Parliamentary support to the hon. Member for Carlisle. The question was put to him—“Will you, as in former years, support the Permissive Bill?” and my late hon. Colleague for the first time in his life said—“I do not believe in making men temperate by Act of Parliament.” What was the result? He was not returned to Parliament; and that, I think, is a strong argument as showing that the people of Leeds are in favour of temperance principles. My presence here is as strong an argument as can be used to show that the great mass of the people are in favour of temperance as opposed to the principles of my hon. and learned Colleague. I have always been honoured by the uncompromising opposition of the licensed victuallers. Before 1868 they regarded me as a dangerous man; but all their opposition in 1868 did not prevent me and my late Colleague Mr. Baines—who was a teetotaler—from being returned at the head of the poll. Since 1868 they have been more bitterly opposed to me than ever, but all their bitterness and all their opposition did not prevent my being returned at the head of the poll in 1874. My object in referring to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend, and in using this language, has been to show that my hon. and learned Colleague has not the great mass of the people of the borough of Leeds at his back in the course which he has taken. I do not in the slightest degree desire to condemn my hon. and learned Colleague in the course which he has taken; he has a right to his opinions, and he has the courage of his opinions and his convictions, which a great many men have not. I believe that he is thoroughly honest in his views, and that no man believes more thoroughly in the cause he advocates. I do not censure him, I merely wish to put the question before the House in this light:—So far from my hon. and learned Colleague representing the intelligence and morality of the great masses of people of Leeds on this matter, he does not speak in their interests and on their behalf at all. There have been within the last five months scores of meetings held in the borough of Leeds for the purpose of supporting temperance, and my hon. Friend (Sir Wilfred Lawson) with respect to his Bill, but there has been no meeting on the other side except a meeting of the Licensed Victuallers' Association, and of course they are directly interested in the matter. I thank the House for listening with so much patience to my imperfect remarks. Until the Government, whether Conservative or Liberal, undertake to deal with this question in a satisfactory manner—I do not mean dealing with it in the manner in which successive Governments have been in the habit of dealing with it—I shall feel it my duty to support the hon. Member for Carlisle.

MR. ROEBUCK: I beg to assure the House that I shall not long occupy their attention; to tell the truth, however, my present step rather alarms me after the speech we have just heard from the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Carter). Imputations have been thrown broadcast by him on his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Wheelhouse) that he is supported by the licensed victuallers. So am I. I am told he has attended their dinners. I have not; but notwithstanding all that has been said of him at the close of the speech of the hon. Member he said of his hon. and learned Colleague that he was a man who had the courage of his opinions, and that he knew he was honest and spoke what he felt. Well, that answered all he had said before, and destroyed the imputation that he was under the guidance of the licensed victuallers. I want, however, to lift this question out of the mud of personalities. I want to ask certain questions which I will attempt to answer, and which from a long political life I think myself somewhat entitled and competent to answer. I want to ask if this Bill is a wise Bill; next, if it is a just Bill; and third, if it is a practicable Bill. Now, is it a wise Bill? We are placed by Providence in a world surrounded by certain means by which we are to be made better and more comfortable in our condition and in the enjoyment of life. In ancient times it was expressed in the short phrase—"That a country enjoyed corn, wine, and oil." Two of these things are struck at by this Bill, and that which ancient experience has taught us to believe to be great boons of the God of Nature this Permissive Bill is about to destroy and deprive man of. But it is said "this gift of God is a dangerous gift." Now, I would ask, is not every gift of God dangerous? He has given us metal, and we use it for our own destruction. He has given us medicines, and we use them as poisons; and when I am told that the liquor traffic is dangerous, I ask, Is not the chemist's trade a dangerous one, and are we not obliged to surround it by laws exactly as we surround the liquor traffic? Do we not also surround the dealing with powder with laws? Yet who will get up and say that no nation shall make powder or use medicines? The fact is this is an argument which has been driven to an absurdity. Supposing that the Bill was universally adopted, and the majority in England were to be allowed to determine what the minority shall drink, the result would be that every man's private arrangements would be interfered with. We may be told that other laws do that; but there is a broad distinction. Laws do not interfere with men in certain cases. They do not regulate their private life. All they endeavour to do is to regulate a man's conduct so that he shall not be a mischief to his neighbours. That is already done, or may be done, with regard to the liquor traffic. If a man chooses to make a beast of himself and get drunk, the law may take charge of him, and say—"You have offended against the rules of your country, and we will put you into prison." But to say that I who have lived a life of temperance, and know not what it is to be drunk, should be deprived of a glass of wine or beer, is going beyond the rule of law and jurisprudence, and cannot be brought forward as a line which we should follow. Therefore, I say this is not a wise Bill, and I affirm my conviction that if it passed, England would become next to a hell upon earth. I will tell you why. In every parish there would arise a contest which would be constantly carried on, and there would be an espionage instituted over every man's life. We should have A and B discussing what C and D drank, and we should have one-half of the community ranged against the other. We should, in fact, have in England from one end to the other a scene of riot, confusion, and disquiet. Not only that, but if the law was enforced, I am convinced you would have a rebellion. The advocates of the measure, though they claim to represent the people of England, in reality do no such thing; and the people, if the Bill passed, would not submit to such coercion, but would say that Parliament had nothing to do with their inmost life, which was, and which ought to be, under their own guidance. Now, is it a just Bill? What does it ask? Why, it asks that a majority of rate-payers in any community are to be able to say that all the rest shall not have the liberty to drink. Is that justice? The minority will say—"We have done nothing to offend the law; why should we be prevented enjoying that which Providence has given us?" Therefore, I hold that this is an unjust Bill. Well, is it a practical Bill? I will now endeavour to show what the real working of the Bill will be if it is passed. Supposing that in the parish A or B there is a meeting held, and a determination arrived at by two-thirds that the Bill shall be enforced in that parish. The parish will after all be a small area, and the district around it will not be affected by the law, and in the result there will not be the slightest diminution of the liquor traffic. So what is the use of passing the law? All round the precincts of the parish public-houses will be built and liquor will be transferred into the parish as freely as if it were done by pipes under the earth. If I go a step further and suppose that the whole of England would place itself under the operation of this Limited Liability Permissive Bill, then there would be a rebellion in the country. Summing up the whole thing in a few words, I would ask, why are we to be called upon, year after year, to express so strong an opinion as we have expressed regarding this Bill? I think I can imagine why. There is nothing in this world showing itself upon every action so much as personal vanity. I have seen very curious instances of that in my life in this House. I have seen it attempted to make one law for England, Scotland, and Ireland, and I have seen that opposed, and opposed moreover very much for one particular reason, and that was, that there were certain persons in this House who when laws were made for Scotland were the heroes of the night, and when laws were made for Ireland others came forward, and they were the heroes of the night; and when this Bill is brought forward the proposers are the heroes of the day. That is a sufficient explanation, and I think if the House were to take the wise course it would throw this Bill out on the first reading, and then there would be an end to all the injudicious and injurious agitation throughout the country. At present the country is kept in a state of fear lest the day should arrive when the Bill would pass the second reading. We have Petitions marshalled before us to-day, but we know what organization has got them up. I am told the Permissive Bill has £100,000 at its back. That money is being spent in procuring these enormous rolls of paper called Petitions, which are signed by men, women, and children, and often not only by men, but by the same men several times over. With £100,000 and a cry you may at any time get up these Petitions. I have seen many occasions when Petitions have been disregarded by this House, and I beseech hon. Members on this occasion to judge by their own reason and knowledge of life whether this Bill is a righteous one. If this Alliance would turn their hearts to the improvement of the morality of the people, and they would preach to the people the conduct they ought to pursue would take pains to instruct them, and would do all they can to increase and improve the education of the people, I would say they deserved the thanks of their country; but while they are going upon a wild scheme, which can never come to a beneficial end, they are only a nuisance to the people.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Mr. Speaker,—The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Roebuck) informed us that he rose to lift this question out of the mud of personalities, but, before he had got very far, he said that this Motion was brought forward to gratify my personal vanity. I hope that in the remarks which I shall venture to make to the House, I shall succeed in keeping out of the mud better than he has done. Sir, when I looked at the Order Paper this morning, I found that I had not only my usual two antagonists to contend with, but that their number had been increased to three. First of all, there is my hon. and gallant Friend—[Laughter—]I say “gallant” because he has fought so gallantly—the Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), who always takes up a position against me. I shall not deal with his speech, for I think he will excuse me if I say he is far more successful in “talking out” a Bill than in arguing it out. I have another reason for not alluding very much to what he has said—namely, that he has already been very considerably scathed by his hon. Colleague (Mr. Carter). Then, the second name on the Paper is that of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid). He and the hon. Member for Leeds are a kind of Siamese twins in this matter. Whenever any drink Bill is before the House, together they rush into the fray. Then there is my third opponent whose speech I am sorry I have not yet heard because he is a new opponent, from whom I expect to hear something good, and, looking at Dod's Parliamentary Companion, to find out what manner of man he was, I find him described as “a Conservative” who “has written poems,” and hope still to have the pleasure of hearing him, and that there will be a few moments left in which he can address the House before we divide. I therefore hope hon. Members will allow us to divide on this question to-day, that we may hear how he treats this subject, because then we shall have had it discussed in all its varieties. The hon. Member for Rochester prophesied to the effect that I shall be as old as Methuselah before the Bill is carried, and if we have the speech of the hon. Member to whom I have just referred (Alderman Cotton) we shall have poetry, and the hon. Member for Leeds has given us prose. But, though my foes are so numerous, able, and determined, I feel I meet them at as great an advantage to-day as I ever met them, and I will tell you why. I have nothing new to say, and therefore I am afraid the

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

House will be wearied with my arguments, which they have heard over and over again; but my case is stronger to-day than it ever was before. Every year the present system goes on working the evils against which I come to this House for remedies. If my opponents will come forward and say that that system goes on well, that it is working admirably, and that its effects are seen in reducing pauperism and crime, then they will have something very strong against the Bill. And, surely, it is time they should be able to show some results. We have had this licensing system at work for generations, and of late years it has been talked about, discussed, and debated on in this House more than in any previous period of our history. First of all Mr. Bruce brought in his Bill; then the present Government came into office, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Home Department brought in his Bill, and so the united wisdom of both sides of the House has been brought to bear to bring about a reform of these licensing laws. But what has been the result? Now, I do not think I should be justified in taking up the time of the House with many statistics, but it is necessary that I should give a few statistics, and state a few facts, because if I do not do so some one will, in all probability, rise and say that drunkenness is diminishing very much in the country. It appears, then, from the Returns and estimates of arrests for drunkenness during the year 1873, that they amounted in the Three Kingdoms to no less than 348,000 persons, and I have inquired what the Returns are for the last year, and I find that in England instead of there being a decrease there has been an increase of 2,700 odd, and in Ireland of 1,800 odd, thus making an increase of upwards of 4,000 cases of arrest for drunkenness. The latest Returns for Scotland I have not got. I want the House, however, to observe this, that these figures do not in the slightest degree indicate the extent of the evil. Major Cartwright, the lately deceased Inspector for the Midland counties, used to say, and our observation confirms the opinion, that for every person who is taken up for drunkenness 10 persons escape. In Edinburgh alone, 56 per cent of the persons apprehended for other offences than that of drunkenness are apprehended in a state of intoxication. It is, therefore, altogether impossible for the House to fully realize the enormity, the immensity, of the evil we are attacking. Now, in Glasgow we used to hear of the number of persons taken up for drunkenness; but some one the other day made a discovery—namely, that there were in the preceding year no less than 22,000 more people taken up for drunkenness than appeared in the Returns. These 22,000 persons were taken up for drunkenness by the police, but they were released without coming before the magistrates, and nobody knew anything about it. The other day an effort was made to alter this state of affairs, and then it was found that they had not room enough for the purpose in their prisons. I know I shall be told that this all arises from the high wages in the country; and I quite agree with that. I believe the rate of wages is one of the causes, and it therefore comes to this—that it is to be an excepted rule, that the prosperity of this country, which we all labour to produce, results mainly in enriching the publican and in filling the exchequer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the revenue derived from drink. After all these years of high wages that is what we have come to, and I do not think that any Member of this House will get up and say that this is a satisfactory state of things for what we call a Christian and civilized country. And I know more than this. I know the House will listen to any remedy which is suggested for grappling with the evil, although it may not believe that it is the most effectual remedy. I do think, then, we have a case for coming before this House, and I do not think I have ever felt so humiliated as I did on Monday night in this House, and I am sure we all did, if we could speak out what we thought, when the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary brought in that flogging Bill. Mind, I am not now saying that that is a wrong Bill, far from it, for this is not the time to discuss it. It may be absolutely necessary, and that is a point which can be argued at another time; but if it be absolutely necessary, it is much to be regretted that after years of teaching and preaching Christianity and civilization in this country we are obliged to have recourse to this horrible system of torture that we thought we had left behind us in the Middle Ages. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Carter) alluded to that wonderful presentment of the Leeds Grand Jury, which I consider goes to the very root of the matter.

"In nearly all the cases which have been brought before them where violence has been committed, whether in aggravated assaults, or in the brutal beating of wives, or in the form of licentious outrages on women, the exciting cause has been strong drink; and the criminals are shown to have often issued from the public-house or beer-house in a state when they had lost reason and self-control. It is in the interest of the whole public that attention should be drawn to the exciting cause as well as to the punishment of such offences."

That sentiment was fully endorsed by the learned Judge who presided on that occasion, and my position is based upon that very recommendation. I say that when people are liable to give way to these temptations, and a small minority of them commit these atrocious crimes, my position is that it is not advisable to thrust upon them, with the strong arm of the law the temptation to drink. That is your present system. ["No, no!"] Some one says, "No, no." Parliament, I say, has laid down very strict and definite rules in this matter, and let me allude to what the rules are which the Imperial Parliament has laid down, and show the House that I am not in any way trying to interfere with them. Parliament, after many years of experience has decided what sort of houses should be employed for the sale of drink; it has decided on what particular day those houses should be opened, and during what particular hours, from early in the morning till late at night. It has decided to what sums of money should be paid and levied on these drinks and on the licence to sell them. It has decided on the penalties which shall be paid by those who consume too much drink or sell too much drink; and more than that, it has decided on the exact class of men who are to engage in this trade. And let me here, when I allude to the class of men, say that I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Carter) in one part of his speech, in which he tried to cast a little slur on the character and conduct of licensed victuallers in this country. I consider them to be picked men of the country, who have been selected by the magistrates for their many excellent and moral qualities. I would ask why we should sneer at the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) for joining on those festive occasions with those excellent men? I have never been asked to attend any of these dinners, but were I asked I should go with a great deal of pleasure. Now, Sir, I do not propose to interfere with any of those rules and regulations which the Imperial Parliament has laid down. I am really not clever enough to run in the face of the aggregate wisdom and the long experience of the House of Commons, and to suggest any improvements in these laws. All I say is, that I want to make a little alteration in the condition under which you allow this elaborate machinery to come into force. No one can sell a drop of drink in this country without the sanction of the magistrates, and the magistrates only grant a licence for the sale of drink to the men who come and ask for it. It therefore follows that the magistrates and the publicans are the people who have the absolute power of setting up this trade in any district where they are so minded. To that power I, Sir, object. That is the only thing which is embodied in my Bill, and that is the whole question which we are discussing to-day—whether it is for the public good, for the advantage of the cause of progress and morality, that magistrates when so minded should, against the will of the majority of their fellow citizens, establish public-houses, gin-shops, and beer-shops in any district. But, Sir, that is not bringing a charge against the publicans: they are commissioned to sell, and they are commissioned to sell just as much as will do a man good, and no more; but, sell him a drop more, and they have exceeded the regulations. And that is one part of my case—that they have often made a mistake, and have sold to a good many men a great deal more than is good for them. It is impossible sometimes to decide for one's self, and it is certainly still more difficult for anyone to decide for him, how much liquor is good for a man, and it is not my case to define what quantity is good for a man. All the publicans in England cannot do it satisfactorily. There is a certain vagueness about the word moderation which baffles all attempts to define it. I remember the late Prime Minister, in one of his Budget speeches, told an anecdote of a working man, who, having got very much injured, was carried to the hospital, where he had to undergo an operation. The doctor at once said—"This is a very serious case, and in order that I may know whether the operation is likely to be successful, I must ascertain from his friends whether or not his habits were moderate." He thereupon asked one of the man's friends if he was a moderate man, and he was told—"Oh, yes! he is a singularly moderate man," and on being further asked how much a day he took, the reply was—"Oh! he never drank more than about eight quarts a day." That shows the difference of opinion which may exist as to what is moderation, and I do not consider the publicans are good judges of the matter, for they have failed to supply the exact amount of drink which is consistent with good order, and which will not produce disorder. In proof, I will tell you a fact, which I think will perhaps rather surprise you. I see the hon. Member for Liverpool sitting near me, and Liverpool is a place where they talk for ever about Licensing Bills. I do not suppose there is a human being there—certainly not a Liverpool magistrate—who has not a strong view of his own as to what ought to be done with the licensing system. At Liverpool, of all places, with a strong police force, with a large number of able magistrates, and a stipendiary magistrate, also, they will take care that the provisions of the licensing laws are carried out whatever they may be, and yet, notwithstanding this, last year no less than 23,000 persons were arrested in that town for getting drunk. But how many publicans does the House suppose were arrested and fined for making these 23,000 people drunk? Just three. Is not that an illustration of the way in which the system works? As to the magistrates, you give them unlimited power of saying what are the wants of a locality, and of this I do not think they can judge. They may have the best objects in view, but they fail; for they do not know what is required, because they have not the means of ascertaining at their disposal. Take the case of Liverpool, for instance. There has been a remarkable map going round the Lobby during the last few days, showing how magisterial discretion has been exercised in Liverpool. If you take the Sailors' Home there as a centre, and draw a circle of 150 yards all round it, you will find no less than 46 public-houses within that circle tempting these men to their ruin and disgrace. So much, then, for magisterial discretion; and now I come to what I propose. I simply propose that all the machinery which you have adopted shall remain untouched. I make no new licensing authority, neither do I make any revolutionary change. I propose nothing as to what houses are the best for the sale of drink, or as to what rent they should pay. I do not propose a single new penalty for any individual under this Bill. I do not believe very much in your penalties and punishments, although they may be necessary to a certain degree: but what I say is, that if there be a place in any part of the Kingdom—some country place, it may be, where there is a large majority—I say of two-thirds—in the Bill, copying in this respect some other Acts, who think that on the whole they could get on better without these drink-shops amongst them, they shall have the power of saying to the magistrates—"You shall not set this elaborate machinery in motion; you shall not licence these places, for they ought to be licensed, not for the good of the publican, but for the good of the public." I know, Sir, that if I begin to go into the details of the Bill I shall very properly be called to Order by you, because we are now discussing the principle of my proposal; but as one or two of my opponents have gone a little into detail, I am bound to defend myself upon the points they have raised. The hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid) says that I give three years for the experiment of prohibition; but that if they refuse to adopt it, the agitation may be renewed at the end of one year. Now I think that as we have tried the old system from generation to generation, it is only fair that a three years' trial shall be given to my system where a district decides upon adopting it, so that a fair opportunity may be given for ascertaining how it answers. Let me observe that in my Bill I have endeavoured to be very fair. I have said that although it requires an immense majority to bring my Bill into force—namely, two-thirds, yet if after a three years' trial a district finds itself poorer and worse off than it was before, if there is more drunkenness than had hitherto prevailed, then they may resort to the old system, and restore to the magistrates and the publicans the power of establishing these places by a majority of one vote only. Then the hon. Member for Rochester thought that I ought not to have taken the ratepayers and left it with them to decide, but that I ought to have taken the inhabitants generally. I am anxious to take the widest franchise I am able to get hold of and I am not ashamed of the ratepayers' franchise which I have proposed. I do not know how I can possibly make the register wider, but I am not bound to my franchise of the ratepayers. Still I remember on the first occasion of my bringing this Bill before the House the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham made a speech approving of some parts of the Bill, and in the course of that speech he said no doubt exception might be taken to the rate-paying franchise, but the ratepayers did substantially represent the views and the opinions of a neighbourhood. I hope the House sees really what I mean, that this is not intended to be a large and comprehensive measure. That is left for right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, who are always bringing in large and comprehensive measures. This Bill of mine is only meant for those few places which are ready for it, and which really think they would be better without these houses. Last night I was speaking to a right hon. Friend of mine in the Lobby—I will not give his name, but he is an excellent and good man—and he said he should vote against my Bill, and added—"We don't want the Bill in my parish; there were three public-houses there, and I swept them all away." I said to him—"Well, do the people suffer much or complain?" He laughed in my face and said—"Complain! why they are all delighted." I said—"Do you mean to-morrow to go and vote that the people up and down the country in any other parish who may feel the same evil that you felt, and who may wish to remove it, shall not have the same power of protecting themselves as you did in your parish?" and, Mr. Speaker, he was speechless. Now, let the House understand that I do not come here in a bigoted way to say that my Bill is the great panacea for all the evils in creation. I have heard it said over and over again that its machinery is insufficient, but I am not wedded to that machinery, and I will tell the House how I constructed it. You have many Acts of Parliament dealing with various matters which are of a permissive character, as the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary well knows. You have them for securing the cleanliness, the health, and the education of a district and so on. I got the best machinery I could out of these Acts, and pieced it together, taking a piece from one and a piece from the other, and it is open to revision by any hon. Member who can show me anything better. No man can go into the Lobby and say he voted against the machinery of the measure, because that is a matter which is wholly and entirely a question for the Committee. Now, I will come to the arguments against the Bill. Its opponents argue that compensation ought to be provided for in the Bill, and upon this point I would say that is a point for Committee also. But are you sure about this compensation? Let me give you what the Bishop of Peterborough said on this subject. Not long since the right rev. Prelate was speaking about the law of simony, and he, using a good expression, said—"the law of simony has slipped from its moral basis." So have the licensing laws, and so have a good many other laws. As to the compensation business the Bishop of Peterborough said he agreed entirely with the assertion that if we touch a man's property we are bound to give him compensation—I thought somebody would have cheered that remark—but the Bishop went on to say—

"I entirely deny that if you take away a privilege which is exceptional and injurious to the public welfare you are bound to give compensation for that; the Legislature always distinguishes between property and privilege."

Now that is precisely what I do. No man has a right to sell drink, except it be a privilege granted to him by the magistrates, and granted only for one year, at the end of which it becomes utterly valueless, and if the State steps in and says—"I decline in future to give you that privilege"—and it has a perfect right to do so—I do not see what just claim there can be for compensation. I will not, however, commit myself, because I have not heard a great lawyer in this case express his views upon this question; but I should like to see one get up and inform the House that there was a shadow of foundation for giving compensation under these circumstances. I believe the result would be he would lose his character for ever. We always hear talk about the Slave Trade and the compensation which was given to the slave-owners. That, however, was paid to them as compensation for their property; but can anyone say that compensation was paid to anybody because he was forced to abandon the Slave Trade? That is quite a different matter, and the case is widely different from the one we have now before us. When a publican makes his bargain with the public one of three things must happen. He must during the years which he carries a licence make a good sum of money, or he must lose money, or he must remain exactly where he was. Now, if he has made a good sum of money he has got his profit, and I would say to him—"Stop your licence, go about your business, and do something respectable." If he has been losing money, it will be a great mercy to take his licence from him altogether; and if he remains exactly where he was before, then there can be no hardship in compelling him to give up his licence, and to do something which is more beneficial. We shall probably hear something about this question of compensation before the debate is finished; but for my part I say most distinctly that I cannot and will not recognize any vested right in producing what this trade does produce—namely, in the words of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, crime, disorder, and madness in the country. But if in Committee any one can show me a fair and just claim for compensation, I am perfectly ready to be convinced. I only wait to hear the argument. I hope I have made it clear what we are going to divide upon to-day, because that is my one point on the second reading. We are going to divide upon this question: Shall irresponsible authorities have the power to thrust drink shops on unwilling communities? Beyond doubt that is what we divide upon, and no one can get off by saying that the issue is anything else than that. All the rest may be done in Committee, if the House will only affirm the principle of the Bill. I do wish that my opponents would be logical; it is a foolish wish I know, and one that is not likely to be realized. Let them, however, have the courage to express their opinions. Let the Home Secretary to-day when he gets up and opposes me, as I think by his countenance he will, let him say that he knows the places where by the wills of benevolent landlords public-houses have been taken away. There is Saltaire. Sir Titus Salt removed the public-houses there, and the people are all the better off for it. In Bessbrook, in Ireland, which was a small town, the landlords prevent the liquor traffic, and the people are better off for it there. We see the same evidence in Scotland. Public-houses have been taken away, and the localities have improved. It is so on the Shaftesbury Park estate, where they will not allow a public-house to be erected. The Prime Minister was there along with me not long since, and he was delighted. I never saw a man so pleased in all my life. He looked round that estate, and saw it free of public-houses, and prosperity and happiness smiling around him, and he said it was "a grand example," or something like that, "which would be useful in future legislation!" and acting on his advice I am utilizing it in legislation to-day. If the Home Secretary is logical, he must bring in a Bill to prevent these arbitrary landlords from shutting up those houses, and depriving the neighbourhood of those luxuries of life. They have done it, but people do not complain. He says that nobody should prevent the public from getting what drink they require. Then why does he allow them to do it? Let him bring in a Bill to compel these public-houses to keep open if he believes they are for the benefit of the people. Last year I quoted the case of Seghill, a mining village in Northumberland, where there were two public-houses, and a very poor neighbourhood, and the proprietor being a benevolent man took a vote of these miners as to whether they would prefer to have these public-houses kept open or not, and by ten to one they decided against them, and the licences to these houses were taken away. Now, what is the result of this? I quote this case again because I have fresh evidence in regard to it. Mr. Alderman Laycock spoke only a week or two ago as follows:—

was in a degraded position. . . . A number of men had asked his opinion some time ago, as to whether he thought the closing of the public-houses altogether would not benefit the people. He was not entirely in favour of the Permissive Bill, which required to have two-thirds of the ratepayers to necessitate the closing of the houses. However, instead of a bare majority, ten to one voted for the closing of the houses; and, although it was a great sacrifice to himself, he felt it to be his duty to close the houses, if by that means he could elevate the people of the village. . . . He had great pleasure in finding, from police reports and other sources, that the people were more sober in their habits than they were before the closing of those houses."

I am trying to persuade the House to allow the people to do for themselves what Alderman Laycock did for them at Seghill. If the Home Secretary is logical, he must provide for the establishment of public-houses in these places to make the people drink again. There is another question which has been before the House this year, and which has met with considerably more support than my proposition has. I allude to the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth), for closing public-houses, compulsorily and entirely, with the exception of the usual regulations, on what is called the Lord's Day. Well, in my opinion, every day is the Lord's Day, in so far as we ought to follow the dictates of morality; and I wish the late Prime Minister was here, for he made a speech on this subject than which I think, although he has made many eloquent and thrilling speeches in his time, none ever gave more delight to the people of this country. The sentiments which he then expressed, and the principles which he maintained must absolutely and certainly be endorsed before long, and they go further than the policy which is embodied in the Bill now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Is not this one of the questions on which the people of the three Kingdoms are in equity fairly entitled to have an opinion for themselves?"

Why, that is my Bill; to let people have an opinion for themselves, and to give them the power of acting upon it with regard to these places established around them. Why are the Irish people to be allowed to get rid of the pollution of public-houses on Sundays, and the English people not to be allowed to do the same on Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, or any other day in the week? Is there anything peculiar in the state of Ireland which should permit them to have that privilege and to deny it to our fellow-countrymen in England? I remember the first speech made in this House by Mr. Delahunty, the late Member for Waterford, whom we generally regarded as an entertaining Member. When he got up he said—"Sir, Ireland is an island; it is entirely surrounded by water." But what difference does that make? Why is a place surrounded by water to be considered, and a parish surrounded by an imaginary line not to have its wishes considered? The argument runs on all fours, and the Members opposing my Bill may think they are consistent when in reality they are most inconsistent. In my case there are many signs of the times which prove that this question cannot be grappled with in any other way than by establishing in some form or other the principle of local option. There was a very remarkable meeting at Birmingham the other day of the leaders of the Liberal Party in that town. This is no Party question; but I quote it as one of the signs of the times, and the hon. Members for Birmingham need not listen to this part of my speech if they do not like it. There is an organization at Birmingham consisting of 400 electors, who are supposed to be what is called the élite of the Liberal Party, and they met not long ago to discuss the regulations of the liquor traffic. And they passed this resolution, virtually unanimously—"That this meeting is of opinion that the liquor traffic should be under the control of the rate-payers." Do not let the House be led away. I know that different speakers attach different meanings to the word "control." But somebody asked the mover of the resolution—"Do you mean absolute control?" "Of course I do," he said; "control is absolute control. I am not going to indulge in tautology." Now absolute control must mean the absolute veto. And absolute veto is what is contained in the Permissive Bill. The 400 electors of Birmingham thus endorsed the Permissive Bill at that meeting, and I hope that the three Members for Birmingham will some day, I fear not to-day—at least I have not much hope of it—prove as liberal in their views as are those who elected them. Then they said that they would commission a committee of their number to draw up a scheme to embody their principles. This is right, I am waiting for the scheme, and when it comes forward I shall probably give it my support; but in the meantime we have got no scheme. But not only have I got the Liberal Party of Birmingham with me, but I have got a more powerful institution with me than that. I have got the Established Church with me. What do they say? In the report of a Committee of Convocation they say—

"Your committee are of opinion that as the ancient and avowed object of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquor is to supply the public with drink, the power of restraining the issue and renewal of licences should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected—namely, the inhabitants themselves, who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system."

I am happy to say that in addition to that recommendation we have now a most powerful organization, of whom one of the leading members is my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone), which is called the Church of England Temperance Society, and it is supported by the whole, or nearly the whole, of the Bench of Bishops. And I am very glad to find in the list the name of the Bishop of Peterborough, because he once uttered a sentence which gave great delight to the friends of the hon. Member for Leeds—I mean the publicans. He said—

"It would be better that England should be free than that England should be compulsorily sober."—[3 Hansard, ccc. 86]— which was quite incomprehensible to me, because I did not see how freedom and sobriety could be antagonistic to each other. However, he said that, and that we who were defending the Permissive Bill were doing mischief. Well, now, he supports the Permissive Bill and something much more. I dare say he would deny that, but I shall show that it is so. The Bishop of Peterborough supports and advocates "giving to public opinion its due share, in conjunction with the existing authorities, in the granting or refusing of licences, and in the regulation of public-houses and beer-shops." Capital! That goes a great deal further than I go. I simply say that if people are ready and anxious for it, let them have the power of refusing licences; but the Bishops put it into other hands to grant licences, and interfere with the magisterial discretion in regulating the public-houses and beer-shops. Now I say if that be the case, they certainly go further than I go, and they are advocating a more extreme measure than mine. The House cannot, perhaps, go so far as these extreme men go. I think it would be well if they would come forward and support me, "rejoicing in the day of small things." I am quite willing to support them. I think it would be well if they would come forward and support me, and give me their assistance, when they know that I am perfectly ready to support them heart and soul when they choose to bring forward their more complete measure into this House. But, perhaps, my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough may aspire to be what is called a practical man. I found out lately what a practical man is. A practical man, according to the newspapers, is one who abuses Sir Wilfrid Lawson's scheme and does nothing at all himself. Now, do not let my hon. Friend fall into that practical error. Let him vote with me to-day, and when his elaborate Bill comes in next year—if he brings one in—he will find no more hearty supporter than I shall be. Then, there is a great objection to this Bill because it is permissive. I do not know how it got the name of the Permissive Bill. There are heaps of Permissive Acts. I believe it is called the Permissive Bill, because the people of this country have a belief that it will do more good than all the other Permissive Acts put together. Your present licensing law is permissive. Nobody knows that better than the Home Secretary sitting opposite me. No magistrate is obliged to licence any place. The district is marked out for him, and he is permitted to licence those places which, again, to use the words of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, produce crime, disorder, and madness in the country, and all that I want to do is to make a little alteration in that permissive law, and to permit the people to prohibit licences in these districts. It is clearly an alteration in the bye-laws of the country. I may be told, and told very truly, that this law will only come into operation in a few places. That is not my concern. I advocate it because it is just, and I wish to do justice to those places which are ready for it. I quite admit that there are many places which are too foolish to think of putting it into force. Knowledge comes and wisdom lingers, and it will be a good while before many places are wise enough to do away with the public-houses. But there are some simple people who will be wise enough to do it, if we are wise enough to sanction their doing it. Well, there is good done if you only clear out one place. I see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire sitting opposite to me, and once he, when we were debating this matter, reproved me for my Bill, and said that if the drunkards could not get their liquor in one parish under the operation of my Bill, they would go on to another. That is an extraordinary idea. The idea of the right hon. Gentleman was that we should have a law provided for an equal distribution of drunkards throughout the country. Why, if they went to the adjoining parish, that parish would have nothing to do but to adopt the same course that No. 1 had done. If that was done the drunkards would have to go on and on, from parish to parish, until at last they would get to some place where their society was valued and appreciated. And that is very likely what would happen. I was told a story the other day by an hon. Friend of mine who knows a good deal about the Dominion of Canada. He said that there the Lower House of Representatives abolished the bar where the Members were in the habit of enjoying themselves and getting their liquor; and the consequence was that as the Members could not get their liquor there, they went away to the bar of the Upper House, where they could, and there was always great difficulty in getting them back to a division. And that might be the case here. If this bar were done away with, I can fancy that hon. Members would go up to the bar of the House of Lords, and drink with the Peers Spiritual and Temporal, and we should find a difficulty in getting them back again. And if the bar of the House of Lords were done away with, we should have the Peers Spiritual and spirituous coming down here for their liquor. Then we are told that the people would not be benefited by this measure. I deny that utterly. I say that such an Act as this would have a great moral effect even in places where it was not adopted. The publicans would feel that there was the sword of Damocles hanging over them, which only wanted the breath of public opinion to bring it down and polish them off. This would be the state of feeling. The people in a district where the Act was in force would see that pauperism and crime were decreasing, and the publicans in other districts would say—"This will not do; we must restrain ourselves; we must not go too far; we must not sell too much drink. Another suicide, a couple more murders, or, what will perhaps have more effect, another penny in the pound on the rates, will drive the people to put the Permissive Bill in force." My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) has been in America lately, and he kindly gave me a few facts which had been collected by the Governor of Rhode Island. The Governor of Rhode Island made a few inquiries into the operation of the prohibitory law in Rhode Island, where the Act is in force. Some men said it worked well, and some said it did not; and from one man he got this answer—"In my opinion, the moderate drinking party are getting as much liquor as they want, while the notoriously drunken party are not." Two men of the latter class were asked why they worked more steadily than they used to do, and the answer was—"Because we cannot get the liquor, for the liquor-sellers dare not sell enough to make us drunk, lest we expose them." I do not know whether hon. Members remember seeing an excellent picture which appeared last year in one of our illustrated weekly periodicals. There is a gin-shop and a wretched, ragged, half-starved, miserable human being, such as we manufacture wholesale by our system, is standing at the door. There is a comfortable, well-dressed landlady standing at the bar, and she looks at the poor wretch who has been made what he is by drink, and she says to the potboy—"Joe, turn that lot out." Joe replies to the landlady—"He says he has fourpence." "Then," says the landlady, "ask the gentleman what he will have to drink." That requires no explanation. But, Sir, surely if this Bill is opposed because it is a Permissive Bill, the right hon. Gentlemen whom I see on the Treasury Bench ought to be the last men in the world to oppose a Permissive Bill. Has not the whole of this Session been permissive legislation from beginning to end? The Local Government Board brought in a long Bill relating to the public health, and the clauses are permissive from beginning to end. Then there is the Home Secretary who has brought in an Artizans Dwellings Bill. There is also a Permissive Bill. It permits a locality to remove houses which produce immorality, crime, and misery. I want a Bill to allow localities to remove the public-houses, which also produce immorality, crime, and misery. And then I come to the Prime Minister himself. We are all looking forward with intense eagerness to the day when he will bring in the Agricultural Holdings Bill, and that, I understand, is a Permissive Bill. It is only to come into force when people choose that it shall come into force. And last year what did we see? There was a great Bill for reforming the Church, and it is to come into force on the 1st of July. And in it the parishioners are permitted to bully any clergyman they may please who happens to be distasteful to them. That, the great Bill of last Session, is a permissive measure, and on the 1st of next July the aggrieved parishioners will be out on the war path. And is the Government, who supported that Bill, to get up and say—"We condemn the Permissive Bill?" I do not know whether we shall have the old argument that education is a sovereign cure. Well, I was told that when I first brought the Bill in 11 years ago, and you have been educating at high-pressure ever since. It should begin to tell a little, instead of which I prove to you that things are worse to-day than they were 11 years ago. But I do hope that hon. Gentlemen who talk about education being a sovereign cure will tell us how long we are to wait for it and when it is to be effectual. I am sure that if we wait until education cures drunkenness we shall have to wait a long time, and so long as you have a half-educated population, I say that it is a crime to set this temptation before them, and then every Sunday to go to church and say—"Lead us not into temptation." Now, Sir, I suppose the Government will oppose me. I have always observed during rather a long course of observation of Home Secretaries, that nothing rouses them to such a Parliamentary frenzy as the mention of the Permissive Bill. Even Sir George

Sir Wulfrid Lawson

Grey used to get excited, and as for Mr. Bruce, his wrath was terrible. And even my right hon. Friend opposite, courteous and good humoured as he is, gets into a species of fury when this terrible measure is brought forward, and calls upon his own party and the whole House to give it its final quietus, which he has not succeeded in doing. But I am anxious to hear to-day what his policy really is on this matter, because I know that he is quite as anxious to promote temperance as I am. There is nothing I hate so much as to be called the "apostle of temperance." [Laughter.] The House laughs, but I am not joking. I say that any man who would wish to continue the drunkenness which exists in this country is not a man but a devil. The only difference between me and my hon. Friends on whichever side of the House they sit, is as to the means of doing it. I do hope that nobody, either in ridicule or praise, will call me the "apostle of temperance," any more than my hon. Friend the Member for Derby. But I have hopes of the Home Secretary, because at Whitsuntide he employed himself in the midst of his arduous avocations very usefully, and went down to meet his constituents and lay the foundation stone of a church. He was well received—as I believe he ought to be. There was a promiscuous gathering of all classes and ranks to receive him. There was a volunteer corps, a number of clergymen, a Band of Hope; there were several brass bands playing Moody and Sankey hymns; and the discourse he delivered on that occasion was so good that he will excuse me reading it to the House. He said to his constituents—

"People said, why won't you make laws for the suppression of vice and for the furtherance of virtue? We might make laws, but we could do little in that direction by that means. We could not make laws much in advance at any time of public opinion."

Exactly. That is my Bill, you know.

"And it was the laity of the Church of England and of all other Churches who had to help to form that public opinion which eventually found its expression in the laws of the land. Now he would take, as an instance, the crime of drunkenness. How much, when they went away from that place, would many of them see of drunkenness, vice, immorality, and wretchedness, even throughout that town of Garston? How much of that did they think by their example they could help to put down? A nation was merely made up of families and neighbours.

They might take the husband and the wife, the parent and the child, or the workman and his fellow-workman, and think how much each individual could do to show the drunkard the shame of drunkenness and to make him hate it; show him that, at all events, if he did not hate it that they hated it, and that so long as he continued in that evil course they could not hold out to him the right hand of fellowship that he should otherwise have. They must remember when they talked of the responsibility of the clergy that there were responsibilities of the laity. He would appeal to the wives and mothers of England whether they did not think that by their example and influence they could do much to mitigate the vice, misery, and drunkenness which we at the present moment saw around us."

Is there any man in this House who will say that the present system is kept up by the women and children of this country? You know as well as I do the whole benefit goes to the men, and that the women and children are the sufferers. The right hon. Gentleman may remember that in a weekly London paper, which writes me down, they said long ago that if this question was left to the women of England they would almost unanimously pass this Bill. My right hon. Friend spoke well and feelingly about it; but was his conscience clear? He talked about the husbands, wives, children, and fellow-workmen, but how much has he said to check drunkenness? What has he done for his constituents? Why, last year he opened the public-houses two hours a-day more. To-day, perhaps, he may suggest something. He may perhaps say that although he cannot support this Bill, he will do his best to bring in another Licensing Bill and strike another blow next year. ["No, no!"] Not likely, I know. But I warn him that if he hoists the flag of "No surrender" he will bitterly regret that he has not listened to the voice of those who have asked him to protect his fellow-countrymen in this matter. I know it might be painful to him to bring in a Bill to make an attack on the drinking business, because we know there are many excellent gentlemen, closely connected with it, who would not like to see their gains diminished. But it is a still more painful thing to let the people of this country understand that the law is made for the benefit of one class, and not for the benefit of the whole community. Sir, I had an illustration of what people think upon this matter when I paid a visit the other day to Sandwich—so admirably represented by my right hon. Friend on the front Opposition bench—and I must say I wonder how such an excellent and good man ever got to represent such a place. I never was in such a place in all my life. I remember a friend of mine told me the story of a man in America who was in the House of Representatives in one of the Western Legislatures, and he was a very drunken man and used to go to the House intoxicated. Somebody on one occasion remonstrated with him, and he said—“Well, the fact is, I am never too drunk to represent my constituency.” Now, that is why I say my right hon. Friend is not in his right place; for if, instead of being a sober and excellent and good man, he was a regular rowdy, he would still be far too good to represent that constituency. It was only the other day I saw, on Her Most Gracious Majesty's birthday, that the ships in the harbour or canal there instead of having their banners flying, as they ought to have done, had them only half-mast high. An inquiry was made why this was done, and it turned out that the men had only had half allowance of beer, proving clearly what is said in many parts of the country is true, that beer is king. I went there once to advocate this little measure of mine, not to do them any harm, but to explain to them that I thought it right that in some places they should be allowed to do without public-houses. But there was a crowd and a great riot when I arrived there. There were sweeps and scavengers, penny whistles and trumpets, and a number of men who declared their devotion to King Beer. They made the greatest tumult and would not allow me to explain my Bill as calmly and with so good a reception as the House has given me to-day. They made such a fearful row that I could hardly speak. At last I called up some of the rioters to the platform and asked them what they had to say. One of those rioters came up three parts drunk, and I said to him—“Now, sir, what have you got to say on this matter.” The man turned and pointed to the great brewer of the place—but I must do him the justice to say that he sat in his place without making any row at all—and said—“What's to become of this gentleman?” Now, when my right hon. Friend gets up do not let him have in mind the 25 brewers who sit in this House and ask—“What is to become of these Gentlemen?” Do not let him think what is to become of those Gentlemen, but let him think what is to become of the country, and then he will act far more as becomes a statesman. Depend upon it, Mr. Speaker, you may build artisans' dwelling-houses, you may increase the police, you may erect schools, you may lay the foundation stones of churches, and you may even introduce barbarous punishments into the law, but you will have no satisfactory change in the habits of the people so long as, for the sake of filling the pockets of the publican and the Exchequer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, you thrust unbounded temptations upon the people of the country, leading them to vice, immorality, and crime. I do not, Sir, defend this Bill upon teetotal grounds. Somebody always gets up and says this is a teetotal question. I believe that the teetotalers are very worthy men, and I respect them. They are a trouble to nobody except to the Members of this House, by sending up boundless Petitions. I appeal to this House, as citizens anxious for the wisest and best laws, regardless of what our personal habits may be in this matter. I have known staunch teetotalers in this House, who have gone on platforms and denounced strong drinks, who yet did not vote for people being permitted to protect themselves from these temptations to drunkenness; and, on the other hand, I have known a brewer who has given me great assistance in this House, and who has voted for the Permissive Bill. Sir, I thank the House for having listened to me so patiently. I hope they understand now the object, the principle, and the machinery of this Bill. At a meeting the other day, a licensed victualler said the agitation for this Bill was unhealthy and venal. I must say that, although I have incurred a great deal of ridicule by carrying on this agitation, I am not aware that one of us will gain a half-penny by it; whereas those gentlemen who send out these circulars over and over again tell us that their interest and livelihood are involved in it. A charge of venal motives therefore does not come with a good grace from them. Well, at all events, I am not doing it for venal motives. I do hope that the House will agree with me that this is a serious case for inquiry and reform. You may again reject this Bill, and I shall not reproach anyone who votes against it in the conscientious belief that temperance is to be promoted by allowing magistrates to force public-houses on reluctant neighbourhoods. You may reject the Bill, and we shall have another year of unchecked steady drinking, misery, crime, immorality, brutality, and pauperism. I ask support only from those who believe that their fellow-countrymen are fitted for local self-government and may be safely entrusted with a power which they can employ for no other purpose than to promote the order, prosperity, happiness, and morality of the community.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, he must deny that the House of Commons wished to encourage drunkenness. He, for one, disliked drunkenness as much as any of the supporters of this Bill, and he thought that the law on the subject showed that the Legislature had always had in view the discouragement of undue temptations to indulgence. But he was opposed to this Bill because it would interfere not only with the private habits of individuals, but with that liberty which constituted the pleasure of life. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had given an account of what took place at a meeting where he was opposed by persons who were averse to his Bill. He (Mr. Alderman Cotton) had had a somewhat similar experience. He did not consider that teetotalism promoted the amenities of life. He was invited to attend a temperance meeting, and spoke; but the moment he expressed a modified dissent from some of the views put forward he was greeted with groans and hisses, and when he said that he believed Sunday was better observed in this than in any other country in the world, he was hooted in such a manner that not a word could be heard, and an Irishman very frankly told him—"Faith, I wish you had never come at all." With respect to the Bill itself, he had little to add to what had been so well said already on the subject. As to the amusing description of the hon. Baronet of the influences which prevailed at ordinary public meetings, he could imagine the hon. Baronet presiding at a temperance meeting, where the aroma of coffee, the strength of the tea, and the enthusiasm of those present might produce a not less marked effect than conviviality had upon Tam o'Shanter—"Kings might be blessed, but Carlisle glorious, o'er all the fumes of tea victorious." It might be objected, further, that temperance people were not temperate, as they did not confine themselves even to cold water or tea, but indulged in peppermint, cloves, and other stimulants—

"Ye Gods! what nectar have we here
Lemonade or gingerbeer,
Peppermint or spicy clove,
The drinks of ever mighty Jove!"

He agreed with those who thought that the best means of attaining the object in view was to promote an improvement in the character of the people of this country by moral and educational means. He did not think there was any necessity for Parliament to interfere in the way it was called upon to do. In conclusion, he thought the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had no more right to call upon the House to prevent a working man from having a glass of beer than they had to pass a Bill to compel him to drink brandy; and he should therefore give his cordial vote against the Bill.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that during the many years he had been in Parliament he had always voted against the "Permissive Prohibitory" Bill, but had never deemed it necessary to trouble the House with his reasons for doing so. If he now broke silence it was entirely owing to the action of his worthy and eccentric Friend the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. Impelled by the restless activity of his nature and his ardent desire to prevent everybody from drinking any thing of a stimulating character, the hon. Baronet, as he had informed the House, had recently quitted his northern home and paid a visit to the shores of Kent. Why he should have selected Sandwich for the scene of his operations, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) could not tell. So, however, it was, and that ancient town, in which from time immemorial people had drank their beer and been all the better for it, was startled out of its propriety by the appearance of this perambulating advocate of an irritating and irksome restriction. The hon. Baronet had suppressed part of the succeeding narrative which he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was bound to supply. He was informed upon credible authority, that some of his constituents were so much astonished at the appearance of his hon. Friend that they prepared to give him practical proof that there was cold water as well as beer in Sandwich, by subjecting him to summary immersion in the canal. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) must offer, on behalf of his constituents, an apology to the hon. Baronet, for the treatment with which he had been threatened. He was sure the hon. Baronet would pardon it the more readily, inasmuch as his constituents had tempered their zeal with discretion, and mixed mercy with their justice; for, as the canal was deep and the bank steep, he understood that ropes and ladders were in readiness upon the spot, to avoid the possibility of a fatal termination to the career of his hon. Friend. He had, however, fortunately escaped to an adjoining school-room in which he held a quiet meeting, and revenged himself by a hostile criticism of his (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's) Parliamentary conduct upon the question now before the House. What he said, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) knew not, for having written to him respecting certain statements imputed to him, he had replied that he had never made them. In the course of the correspondence which followed, his hon. Friend had invited him to come down and discuss the question at Carlisle, but as he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was not fond of going where he had no earthly business to go, he had replied that he would state his objections to the Permissive Bill in the proper place for a Member of Parliament—namely, upon the floor of the House of Commons. At that hour he would not attempt to go at length into the question; but he would state as briefly as he could some half dozen objections to the Bill, each of which appeared to him to be conclusive against it. First, however, he would protest against the assumption by the hon. Baronet and his followers of a monopoly of virtue, or of that particular virtue which led men to desire that others should be sober and temperate. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) and those who thought with him, were just as much alive to the evils of drunkenness as the supporters of the Bill. They only differed as to the manner in which those evils should be subdued. His hon. Friend said—"Excess of drink causes evil to the people, therefore shut up the public-houses and let nobody have anything at all to drink." In fact, his argument went to this—that you should remove temptation from the people. But drink was not the only temptation. Two days ago, whilst talking to his hon. Friend he had observed that he had on a very nice gold watch-chain. He did not know whether he had it still, as he had observed that in the interval he had attended a crowded meeting of teetotallers, and possibly the principle of his own Bill might have been applied to him and his power of tempting people to steal removed. But, whilst he had it, and openly displayed it, he directly tempted the cupidity of his fellow-creatures, and to be consistent he should forbid portable property of value to be thus displayed and carried about. The fact was, that his hon. Friend would find the task endless and hopeless, if he intended to remove temptation from human nature. They were told on high authority to "resist the devil and he will flee from you," but his hon. Friend proposed to abolish the devil altogether, which he would find somewhat difficult. The truth was that we never could remove temptation from human nature, but what we might do and should aim at was to improve and strengthen human nature so that it might be better able to resist temptation. Now, let him state some of the main arguments against the Bill. In the first place, it was subversive of all the principles upon which England and most other civilized countries had been governed for many centuries. Among savage tribes, and with men in a primitive state, no doubt actual majorities made laws and imposed them upon the minority. But as nations increased in number and intelligence, they found it better to entrust the making of their laws to representative bodies. So in England Parliament made laws which the people obeyed, and the administration of these laws was entrusted to a limited executive. But this Bill would reverse this system, and revert to the old plan, and yet do so in a clumsy and imperfect manner. The ratepayers were not synonymous with the people, and it would be quite possible that two-thirds of the ratepayers might be the minority of the population in any given area. But if two-thirds of the ratepayers were to be the best judges upon this particular question, why not upon other questions of a social and political character? It was impossible that they could stop at this particular point, if they once admitted the principle. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) remembered that he had given an answer to the first deputation which, years ago, had waited upon him upon this question, which answer had since been given by greater men, and was now familiar to the House. He had said—

“If your principle is good for anything, you must carry it further. You say that you desire to free the people from a poison which injures their bodies. But there are moral poisons which injure the soul. If the ratepayers are to close the public-houses, why may not they close the Roman Catholic chapels, where a majority of two-thirds of Protestants can be found; and in Ireland why may not the similar majority of Roman Catholics close the Protestant churches?”

And let them remember that in each case those majorities would believe—and honestly believe—that they were preventing the diffusion of a moral poison as pernicious to the welfare of the souls of the people as excess of drink was to their bodies. But if you carried out the principle you would soon bring Government to a dead-lock, and all would be inextricable confusion. Well, then, another objection to the Bill was this, that it would be adopted just in the places where it was least wanted. Where the habits of the people did not lead them to frequent public-houses, the Act might be adopted; but where the contrary was the case, and where most drinking prevailed, the requisite majority would never be obtained. Then, again, it would operate unequally. Take Sandwich, for instance. His hon. Friend would probably now be of opinion that there was little chance of his Act ever being adopted there. But close by Sandwich was the village of Eastry, recently declared a “populous place,” and under the immediate wing of the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) a devoted supporter of the Bill. Suppose he should persuade two-thirds of the ratepayers of Eastry to adopt this Act. What would be the consequence? The drinking portion of Eastry would come down to drink in Sandwich, and if there were evils in that town in consequence of drink, they would thereby be increased. Moreover, the Bill was incomplete and illogical. It made it a crime to sell liquor in certain cases, but not to buy it; so that anybody might freely buy beer in Sandwich and give it away for private drinking in Eastry. And it left the manufacture of the article untouched, whereas if it was wrong to sell and consume it, they ought surely to declare that it was wrong to make it at all! Then there was the old argument that this would be class legislation. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) disliked clap-trap phrases; but this much was certainly true, that whilst the rich man, who had his club, and who could store large quantities of wine and beer in his house, would escape the operation of this Act; the persons who would feel it would be the poor men who could get their drink nowhere else but at the public-houses. Then this legislation would produce illicit distillation, and smuggling, and as a matter of fact we should have just the same things going on as at present, only they would be done furtively and secretly, instead of, as now, openly and under proper regulation. One more objection to the Bill was this—that it would afford one more subject for agitation, and that agitation would undoubtedly take place from one end of the country to the other. The truth was, that from first to last, the advocates of this measure confounded the use with the abuse of liquor. Take other instances. People blew themselves up occasionally with gunpowder, and therewith wars were waged and great misery inflicted upon nations. But would the hon. Baronet therefore forbid the use of gunpowder for the many useful purposes for which it was employed by mankind? Take another instance. Litigation was a thing which had ruined hundreds and thousands. Would the hon. Baronet therefore close the Courts, imprison the lawyers, and have no more law in the country? He did not wish to detain the House longer, but the hon. Baronet had blamed him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) elsewhere, though not in that debate, for having remarked that with regard to licensing measures, he advocated consulting the brewers and licensed victuallers. What he had said he would frankly and boldly repeat. The licensed victuallers, rightly or wrongly, had been placed by Parliament in this position—that under a legal system of regulated monopoly, they had to guide and maintain the liquor traffic. He thought therefore that it had always been a gigantic mistake to consider them, as some legislators had appeared to do, as if they were public enemies, and that in bringing forward measures affecting their trade—a trade in which £120,000,000 of capital were embarked—it would have been well to consult, not those who were the advocates of restriction and the declared enemies of the trade, but those who were conversant with its organization, and who might be able to advise as to the manner in which necessary restrictions and proper supervision might be secured with the least possible interference with a legitimate trade, and the smallest possible amount of public inconvenience. It was most desirable, no doubt, that only fit and proper houses should be licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and that only fit and proper persons should be entrusted with the traffic. If the House desired to diminish the evils of drunkenness in the country, they must proceed by other agencies than those which alone appeared to suggest themselves to the mind of the hon. Member for Carlisle. They would never effect their purpose by sudden and impulsive action, by coercive legislation, or by harsh restrictions which were not in consonance with the feelings of the general community. The work must be done gradually and cautiously. They must endeavour to elevate the physical and moral condition of the classes among whom the evils of drunkenness principally prevailed. The progress of the educational movement—in spite of the slighting tone in which it had been spoken of by the hon. Member for Carlisle—would do something, but there was more that might be done. Improvement of the dwellings of the operative classes, so that a man might not have to seek in the public-house that cleanliness and decency which he ought to find at home—this was one point of importance. Another was the providing of innocent recreations for the people, so that the poor man might learn some higher notion of pleasure than that of drowning his cares in beer, and find some other place than the tap-room in which he might enjoy social amusement and friendly conversation. But, after all had been done, evil would remain as long as human nature remained what it was, even if every public-house in England could be closed at once and never opened again. You could not cut down drunkenness like a tree, but you might do much to mitigate the evil. Punish the drunkard if you would, and consider drunkenness as an aggravation of crime instead of an excuse for it, as had too often been the case. Guide, instruct, elevate as you would; but the public opinion of this country would never allow you to punish the abuse of liquor by one man in 1,000 by forbidding its use to the other 999. The attempt to do so would inevitably fail, and if this Bill were carried it would create evasion and deception, and would ultimately be followed by a revulsion of feeling which would increase ten-fold the evils against which it was aimed. It would fail because it was unwise and unjust; it would fail because its operation would be unequal and oppressive; above all, it would fail because both in its conception and its execution it was opposed to the thoughts, the feelings, the traditions, and the character of the English people.

MR. SULLIVAN: I support the measure before the House because I consider it to be a moderate proposal for dealing with a gigantic evil. When first I heard of this measure, some years ago, I withheld my support until I had heard speeches for and against it. I have heard speeches on the Permissive Bill, and I say that I have been made a determined supporter of the Permissive Bill by those speeches which have been made against it in this House and elsewhere. I am sorry, Sir, that I cannot indulge in the compliments which usually pass across the Table between the friends and foes of the Bill, because I charge against the opponents of the measure, and especially against the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), the greatest insincerity and inconsistency. I do not find any consistency in any speech which has been made against the Bill. The hon. Member for Leeds said, in the course of his speech, that the public-house was the poor man's cellar. But does he believe it is the poor man's cellar? No, for if he does he would give him the same access to it as the rich man, and not shut it up at 12 o'clock at night. Are you sincere, honest, and consistent in arguing as you do, and opposing the Maine Law when you have a Maine Law of your own during 8 out of every 24 hours? During the debates on the Public-house Bills, I heard no argument to show why public-houses should be closed at 1 o'clock in the morning any more than they should be closed at noon-day. Rich men can have their drink at 1 o'clock in the morning, and if the public-house is the poor man's cellar, why cannot the poor man also have his beer at 1 o'clock in the morning? Why does not the hon. Member for Leeds stand up in his place and say that the poor man should have access to his cellar as well as the rich man, and at all hours? He does not do so because he has not the courage of his convictions; and I say he is inconsistent. Again, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Rochester is guilty of the grossest inconsistency, as I have seen him constantly voting for prohibition. [Mr. GOLDSMID: No, certainly not.] I am very much mistaken if I have not seen the hon. Gentleman again and again during the discussion on the Liquor Bill vote upon the question of limiting the hours during which the public-houses should be open. [Mr. GOLDSMID: I invariably voted for the longest hours.] If the hon. Gentleman wishes to be considered consistent, he should vote for making the trade entirely free. And here is another anomaly—those who oppose prohibition practise it. Recently in Dublin, in a district where there was no public-house, the licensed victuallers feed counsel to prevent a man, if possible, from getting a licence when he applied for it. What is that but carrying out the provisions of the Permissive Bill? Amongst themselves, in their own selfish interests, the publicans carried out prohibition; but where it is to be not by themselves, but by the people in the interest of the public, the licensed victuallers brought all their force to bear to prevent the Permissive Bill from being passed into law. But Parliament, too, is not consistent. It is admitted that the liquor traffic must be regulated, and if regulated, is it the public convenience, or the licensed victuallers' which is to be studied? Seek to disguise it as you may by all these arguments—I can scarcely call them such, but I do not like to call them "pretences"—your whole object is to prevent the working classes of this country getting their hands upon this traffic to raise themselves out of their misery. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and "No, no!"] Whoever cries "No," and "Oh," let him trust the people—let him trust to the votes of the people. I charge this, and I say there is a silent proof of the progress of the views I am expressing in the debate this afternoon. We have heard less of the arguments which used to be used, about the publican being the friend of the working man, and the people being in favour of the publican. I also notice that the tide is rising in our own colonies. Wherever the people have raised themselves to what is called popular Government—whether in Australia or Canada or the United States—people are getting their hands upon this traffic, and are endeavouring with might and main to suppress it; and as the people attain to power in England so will the publicans' supremacy come to an end all over the land. And I cannot help offering upon this question my protest against the conduct of the Government, especially in so far as the Bill applies to Ireland. A majority of nearly 2 to 1 of the Irish Members are in favour of the Bill. The Irish Solicitor General the other night, when a certain constitutional question was under discussion, invited Irish Members to direct their attention to moral questions. Well, this is a moral question on which Irish Members are substantially united; and when we ask to have our magistrates and Judges taken at their word, and to be allowed to free ourselves from a great evil, this House, in which the popular liberties have been abridged, insist upon our retaining institutions for manufacturing criminals and filling gaols.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had hoped that the speech of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary last year might have had some effect on the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, and convinced him, as he had taken the sense of the new Parliament on the question, that it would be well not to force on the House of Commons annual repetitions of these debates. Again, judging from a speech which the hon. Baronet made the other day, it would appear that his own hopes of success were so small as to induce him to carry out that object. For he found the hon. Baronet stating that probably the measure which he advocated would not become law in the lifetime of any of those whom he addressed.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON denied he had ever made use of any such expression. The hon. Baronet was quoting from the observations of another speaker.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was sorry he had misrepresented the hon. Baronet, but could assure him he had not intended to do so. Turning, then, to the main question, he would say that the arguments against the Bill were plain and simple, and were fully and explicitly stated in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). That hon. and learned Gentleman had, in a few words, placed before the House all the faults of the measure, and his (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson's) own belief agreed with that of the hon. and learned Gentleman—that it was neither a wise, a useful, nor a practical proposal. No doubt the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle thought that if Parliament accepted this measure it would add to the temperance of the country, but the sobriety of the country was not to be promoted by enforcing it even where a majority was in its favour. On the contrary, the effect of that would be to drive the inhabitants of those localities who wished to indulge in the use of intoxicating drinks into neighbouring places where no such prohibition was in force. It was clear that the measure would not produce that amount of sobriety which was expected from it. The same people who drank now would find the means to drink even should the Bill become law, and thus in passing it Parliament would not do anything to aid or promote the cause of temperance. In stating this he wished the hon. Baronet to believe that those who opposed that day, and had always opposed his measure had as anxious a wish as he himself had to see drunkenness done away with, and the only question in dispute between them was as to the best method by which that could be accomplished. Now what was the history of the question? There were some who considered that to throw the trade entirely open would be the proper panacea of the evil. The number was very limited. Then there were others who followed the hon. Baronet in this crusade against public-houses, and their number, he was inclined to think, was also limited. Then there was the large portion of the population which had always recognized the liquor traffic as a necessity, and that the proper mode of dealing with it was by regulation.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

Every Government that had hitherto undertaken to deal with it had followed that view of the case. The whole tone of legislation on the subject was to the effect that, admitting public-houses to be a necessity, the State should interfere and regulate them so as to guard against their abuse. Lord Aberdare had legislated in that spirit, and the Bill of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been in the same direction. The hon. Baronet had quoted some statistics; but he did not place much reliance upon them, as they did not come before him with a trustworthy sound. The hon. Baronet had referred to the 348,000 convictions for drunkenness which had taken place in the course of a year; but even allowing it to be true, it did not represent a correct estimate of the arrested persons, for he omitted to explain that in that total there were included repeated convictions of the same offender, in some instances, he regretted to say, 30 and 40 times over. But even supposing the number represented so many individual drunkards, he would ask the hon. Baronet if he considered the existence of 348,000 drunkards a large proportion of a population of upwards of 21,000,000 of people. For his own part, he did not think it was by any means a large percentage, nor did he think it either wise or prudent to endeavour to restrict the large majority of the people in the reasonable use of intoxicating drinks because there were a few who were not able to control their own acts. He believed that by promoting such measures as the Artizans Dwellings Bill, so as to secure better houses for the working people, and by improving the education of the young of both sexes, they were working for the very proper results which the hon. Baronet had in view. In pursuing that policy they were, he believed, doing that which would produce those good results; whereas if they endeavoured to bring them about by a process of coercion they would produce disorder and confusion, and indefinitely postpone the object which the hon. Baronet had so much at heart. For instance, he would ask the House to try and imagine the confusion which would ensue if it were left to two-thirds of the ratepayers in any locality to decide whether there should be a public-house allowed within it or not. There would be a constant canvassing going on and constant altercation; and the three years during which the prohibition was in force, if they succeeded, would be made use of in efforts to reverse the policy. There was another point he wished the House to consider. The great object of Parliament hitherto had been to bring into the trade men of respectability possessed of a large amount of capital, so that it would be their interest to keep their houses in the best possible order; whereas if they adopted a system under which a man might be allowed to open a public-house to-day, and to-morrow find it swept away by the decision of two-thirds of the ratepayers, how would they, he wished to know, be able to get into the trade that amount of capital and respectability which they desired? In that way, they would lose the surest guarantee for the trade being properly conducted. Again, he objected to the ratepayers being considered the representatives of the population. They were only about one-fifth of the whole population, and they were not, and could not be, the exponents of the wishes of the whole body of the people. Besides, the ratepayers were men who had not the same necessity to be supplied from the public-house with the beverages which the mass of the people required, inasmuch as they had them stored in their own homes, and the result would be the tyrannical imposition of their ideas upon the subject upon those who did and might require them. For these reasons he should oppose this Bill as he had done on previous occasions. He would now refer to the argument of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), in which he stated the House was afraid to trust the people in this matter. That argument went a good deal further. The whole history of Government in this country was that the people delegated their power to their Parliamentary Representatives, and acquiesced in the laws which they made on their behalf, and was the House now to hand that power back to them and allow the inhabitants of each locality to legislate for themselves. That was not, in his opinion, a wise policy for them to adopt. He believed the Bill would be resisted by the Representatives of the people for even a longer period than had been stated in the speech to which reference had been made. It was repugnant to the whole history of our legislation; and, in conclusion, he trusted the decision of the House would be a repetition of the decision it had arrived at before, and that the hon. Baronet would, for the future, devote his brilliant talents to the furtherance of measures which would bring and create among the people the feeling of self-restraint.

MR. MACDONALD said, that last year he felt it his duty to oppose the Bill of the hon. and genial Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and he should do so on the present occasion, although he saw a considerable improvement in the debate, inasmuch as they had not had the American experience trotted out for their admiration—inasmuch as it was now admitted that prohibitory legislation had not proved beneficial in that country. His opposition to the Bill was based on entirely different grounds from those stated by previous speakers. He opposed it on the ground that it was asking Parliament to do that for the people which the people could, if they pleased, do for themselves. They could be sober if they pleased, without being forced to be so, and had the matter entirely in their own hands. They had been told about what had been done by the people of Seghill and Saltaire, and he did not find fault with them for it, but would say to those who admired them for it to go and do likewise, and to leave alone those who did not. They had heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) that he had been informed that a fund of £100,000 had been subscribed for getting up Petitions on this question. He believed that that was the case, but he would ask those who had contributed to that fund to apply it in the employment of popular advocates who might go about the country teaching the people the advantages of self-reliance instead of binding them up in the swaddling clothes of a Permissive Bill. The people had already contributed millions towards the establishment of co-operative societies and other social organizations, and if they were only let alone, more sobriety and good order would be got out of them by their own voluntary action than could be secured by the passing of this measure. He hoped, therefore, the House would reject the Bill, and that, too, by such a majority as would tell its advocates that they must seek to carry out their objects by the agencies he had pointed out rather than by Parliamentary interference. Public-houses would not exist if the people did not want them, and this was not the way to get rid of them. If they did not want them, it would be as just to pass a law to compel them to go into them as it would be to pass the Bill to shut the public-house door in their face when they did require the accommodation which it afforded them. The hon. Baronet had spoken of a certain amount of drunkenness in Edinburgh and Glasgow. Well, what did that prove? Why, it simply showed that in Scotland they had been legislated to death on this question of the liquor traffic. A public-house in Scotland could not open before 8 o'clock in the morning, and it must be closed at 11 o'clock at night, while on Sundays it was not allowed to open at all. The result was that there was a great deal of private drinking carried on. He regretted to have to say, but it was well the House should know it, that he had seen more drinking in a village of 1,000 inhabitants in Scotland, under its restrictive law, than he had seen in London with its 4,000,000 of inhabitants. If they wished the people to be improved let them open museums, so that the people might go there. Let them open their picture galleries, so that they could go there. Let institutions in connection with the Arts and Sciences be placed in all their great cities, and then they would voluntarily emancipate themselves, and when they had emancipated themselves they would stand erect in their own virtue, and would not be bound up in the swaddling clothes of a Bill called permissive, but which he looked upon as being tyrannical.

MR. BURT: I shall not at this hour, when hon. Members are evidently so anxious to go to a division, detain the House more than a very few minutes. Indeed, I should not have spoken at all but for an observation or two which fell from the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill (Mr. Wheelhouse). While admitting, as he could not but do, the vast number of Petitions which had been presented in favour of the Permissive Bill, he said it was a very easy matter, with a good organization and a free expenditure of money, to obtain any number of signatures in favour of anything. If that be so, why have not the licensed victuallers and publicans loaded the Table of the House with Petitions against the Bill? It will not be contended that it is because they are indifferent to the passing of the measure, for that we know is not the case; nor will it be argued that they are too poor or too weak, for they boast that they are the wealthiest trade in the country, and we know that their organization is of the completest kind. The only conclusion, therefore, to which we can come is, that they do not petition because the people will not sign their Petitions so readily as the hon. and learned Member for Leeds would wish us to believe. I believe a large number of the most active and most intelligent of the working classes of the country are in favour of this Bill. I know that many of the Petitions from my own neighbourhood are signed by working men, for I have examined them carefully; and I know further, that the persons who have interested themselves in obtaining these signatures are working men, who, after a laborious and exhausting day's work, and at considerable personal trouble and inconvenience, have canvassed for signatures in favour of the Bill. And it is an unworthy and altogether undeserved imputation on the character of these men to suggest that their unbought, and I may add their unpurchasable services, have been secured by the payment of money. The hon. and learned Member said he questioned whether there were half-a-dozen men who signed these Petitions who did not themselves drink beer. From the confident manner in which he spoke he seemed to believe that no one could exist, much less perform hard work, without intoxicating drink. Well, Sir, that is a great mistake. If I may, without presumption, refer to my own experience, I may inform the House that from the time I was 10 years of age until I was 28 I worked as a coal miner, a kind of employment which is generally acknowledged to be of the most arduous nature, and all the hard physical labour I ever performed was done without intoxicating liquors of any kind. Nor is my experience at all singular in this respect. There are tens of thousands of working men in all branches of trade who work every day without beer, and if we may take their word for it, they are unanimous in their testimony that they can perform their work, not simply as well, but much better without the drink than with it. But, Sir, this is not a temperance question. It is a question of whether or not the inhabitants of a locality should have a voice in deciding if they will have public-houses, or that magistrates and landowners should decide that for them. There are about 2,000 parishes in the United Kingdom in which, by the will of the landlord, no public-houses exist. If these houses are such a blessing, and are really, as so many Members say, a public necessity, I join my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle in asking why the Government does not make some provision for these unfortunate districts? Reference has been made by the hon. Member for Carlisle to Seghill Colliery, and as I am well acquainted with the circumstances of the case, the House, impatient as it naturally is at this hour, will perhaps allow me to briefly refer to the subject. My hon. Friend, I think, did the proprietor of the colliery in question more than justice when he attributed his conduct in closing the public-houses of the village altogether to benevolent motives. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, I am quite willing to allow the gentleman referred to as as high ground as he claimed for himself at the time. I accompanied the workmen on the deputation to him when the suggestion to close the public-houses was made. He said he received certain pecuniary advantages from these houses, but, on the whole, when he took into consideration the loss of work caused by drinking, he questioned very much whether he was at all benefited by such property. He had been told, he said, that a large number of the workmen were anxious to have the public-houses closed, and if the feeling of the men could be fairly tested, and he found a large majority in favour of abolishing the public-houses, he would shut them up altogether. When the vote was taken there were, I believe, seven to one in favour of abolishing the public-houses. These houses were, therefore, shut up, and Seghill was all the better for it. It is, indeed, I must admit, contended by some that the village is now again as bad as ever. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, Sir, that may be, but why is this? The fact still remains that the people when appealed to deliberately gave their verdict against the public-houses, and Seg-

hill is not worse because the people cannot get drink, but because, in spite of the best intelligence and the highest moral sense of the community, beer-houses have been opened out in another part of the village instead of the public-houses. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), who has just addressed the House, has told us that the hon. Member for Carlisle had this year taken new ground in advocating his Bill. I may remind my hon. Friend that he, too, has taken new ground in attacking it. Last Session he opposed it because he said it was an arbitrary and tyrannical measure; but before he sat down he told us that if it had been a Maine Law to sweep away the drink altogether he would have supported it. That may be quite consistent. It seems to me at least just as consistent as the position which he and other hon. Members have taken to-day in considering it a right and proper thing for landowners and employers of labour by their own will to sweep public-houses away, and yet to refuse to the people who suffer and pay the cost the right for a voice in a matter which so deeply concerns them. We have just been told that this is a working man's question. I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford, who has so often rendered such good service to the working classes, and I ask other hon. Members who profess to have an earnest desire to protect and take care of their interests, to show their confidence in and their respect for the working men, by allowing them to say for themselves whether or not they want beer, rather than to have it forced upon them when they do not want it, and to be prevented from obtaining it when perhaps they would like to have it.

ARTIZANS DWELLINGS BILL—(No. 134.)

(The Lord Steward.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Lord Steward.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said,
that before their Lordships proceeded to the third reading of the Bill, he wished to make a few remarks, not in any spirit
of opposition, but by way of observation
on the practical working of the Bill.
He would, in the first place, ask their

would do, and what it would not do. It seemed to him that the area of what it would not do was much larger than that of what it would do. Firstly, it did not attack the case of the smaller towns; next, although it dealt with very large areas, it did not deal with the dwellings of agricultural labourers; but, as their Lordships well knew, the disgraceful state of those dwellings in many parts of the Kingdom could not be denied. In the second place, there was a graver charge against it—the limits as to population laid down in the Bill were such that the measure would not attack the case of the smaller towns. Why? He ventured to think that the action of such a measure would be more beneficial in the case of towns below the limit of population laid down in the Bill than it would be in that of towns above it, and for this good reason—that in the large towns there was far more public spirit and far better means of dealing with the dwellings of the poor than was the case in the smaller towns. Whenever, in the course of the discussions on the Bill, a complaint was made of the want of stringency in its enactments, some one on the Treasury Bench rose and said it was very important to look to the public spirit existing in the large towns. If half that was said on that score were true they might have been trusted to apply like Edinburgh and Glasgow for local Acts, so that in the matters to which this Bill related the large towns had, to a very great extent, the remedy in their own hands. It was not so with the small towns—they might, perhaps, possess a Local Board, but they had not the same wealth or public spirit. Yet for these the Bill did nothing. If comparisons were not odious, he might liken the conduct of the framers of the Bill to that of a certain Levite, who pursued his way to Jericho—being intent, no doubt, on great public matters—and passed by the aggravated case that lay on his way. In like manner the Government, intent on great measures, had passed by the unwholesome areas of small towns in their haste to alleviate the condition of the larger. As regarded the clearing away of unwholesome areas and the pulling down of unhealthy structures in large towns, he saw no reason why the Bill should not effect good; but he feared that its machinery was not very effective—it appeared to him to be cumbrous and expensive, and in addition to this the process of getting to work would be a very long one. This would be the process: First, two justices of the peace or two ratepayers would go to the Medical Officer and point out the unhealthy area; the Medical Officer then made his report to the Local Authority; the Local Authority “take it into their consideration;” they then pass a resolution that the area was unhealthy; after passing that resolution they make an improvement scheme; having completed it, they were to announce its existence in the newspapers during the three autumn months; in the ensuing month they were to serve a notice on the owners and occupiers; they must then present a Petition to the Secretary of State or the Local Government Board for a confirming order; and, lastly, the confirming authority were thereupon to order an inquiry. It could not therefore be said that the procedure was unduly rapid, while it might almost be called cumbrous. Moreover, he feared two results—first, that when the Bill was passed and brought into operation, even should it accomplish its object, the carrying out of schemes under the Bill would entail considerable loss; and, secondly, he feared that the ejected persons would not be accommodated. There would be the cost of buying and pulling down houses. This, he feared, would provoke a cry on the part of the ratepayers, and have the effect of making the Bill extremely unpopular, and in that way hinder its working. An endeavour would be made to recoup by selling the land for the erection of model lodging-houses or by erecting such houses; but, looking to the great cost of building in large towns, it was to be apprehended that the people who had been unhoused by the pulling down of the rookeries in which they had lived would not be able to find in the new buildings dwellings at the rent which they could afford. He would place before their Lordships an illustrative case. In the course of the debates on this Bill a good deal had been said of what had been done in Glasgow and Edinburgh. Now, the case of Edinburgh was not analogous to many which would have to be dealt with under the Bill. Edinburgh was a town in which there was a great deal of space; and, further, in that town a provision was made that before

500 persons were ejected sufficient accommodation must be provided for them elsewhere. The conditions there were therefore exceedingly favourable. But what was the result? The local authority was urged there to build some model dwelling houses as an experiment and an example. They accordingly, on a piece of land worth at least £2,000, built a block of houses which cost £6,972. So that the total cost of the undertaking might be roughly estimated at £9,000. The houses were sold by public auction, and eagerly bought, chiefly by the better class of working men, not exactly the class it was intended to benefit. Six or eight shops at the time he received his information still remained on hand, and supposing these to realize £250 each, it would make the total return for this expenditure of £9,000—£6,200. There were four deductions to be made from this example—1. It implied a direct payment from the rates for the benefit of a particular class. 2. The class benefited was not the class ejected or intended to be benefited. 3. Provision was not thereby made for the ejected occupiers. 4. The transaction involved a loss of 30 per cent. But it might be argued under this Bill private contractors were to build the houses. But even then they would not allow the loss to fall on them so that the expense and the failure would be the same. He however regarded the Bill as a well-intentioned effort on the part of Her Majesty's Government, although he considered its machinery cumbrous, its operations likely to be expensive, and its provisions for giving accommodation to ejected tenants likely to be inadequate.

EARL NELSON said, that everybody seemed to think it necessary to give this measure their support, but, like the noble Earl who had just sat down, that support was what might be called back-handed and half-hearted. The noble Earl complained that the operation of the Act would not be quick enough; but, for his own part, he was glad its action was not too rapid, as that might create evils as great as those proposed to be remedied. The people really had to be educated as to what was necessary to be done. There was a remarkable and rapidly-growing tendency amongst the rural population to move from the country into the towns, which made it of national importance that the health of the towns should be cared for. In France, in recruiting for their army from the country districts, they would summons 13,000 conscripts for 10,000 soldiers, but in the towns and manufacturing districts they had to summons 23,000 conscripts for the same number of soldiers, in one case having to reject only 3,000 in the other 13,000. He had been told that the inhabitants of the back slums of Westminster were in the habit of drinking spirits deliberately late at night with the view of making themselves drunk, because otherwise it would not be possible for them to sleep in their wretched dwellings. Feeling that the operations contemplated by this Bill would do much in the long run to lessen the temptations to drunkenness and promote the health of the people, he heartily supported the third reading.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in reference to the remarks of the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery), said, they were a condensation of all that had been said in opposition to the Bill during its progress through Parliament. The argument was—first, it was a very good Bill; then it was a Bill that would do no good at all; and then why was it not extended to small towns? There were several reasons why the Bill should not be applied to small towns. The system required for small towns was quite a different one from that which was called for in the case of large towns. The evil complained of was not that the population was dense in particular areas, but that the people were crowded in rookeries that were destitute of the proper sanitary arrangements. Some blocks of model lodging-houses contained, for the superficial ground area, a larger number of inhabitants than the condemned dwellings which had stood in the same places. Now, as a rule, these rookeries did not exist in small towns; and the Sanitary Authorities had already sufficient powers to deal with any nuisances that might arise with them.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

LORD REDESDALE again objected to the 12th clause as it then stood. It gave the Secretary of State and the Local Government Board powers over the property of persons such as had never hitherto been exercised except by Par-

"Provided always, that if such modification or alteration shall require a larger public expenditure than that sanctioned by the former scheme, or the taking of any property otherwise than by agreement, or shall affect injuriously other property in a manner different to that proposed in the former scheme without the consent of the owner and occupier of any such property, it must be made by a provisional order to be confirmed by Act of Parliament in the manner provided in Section six of this Act on the completion of an improvement scheme."

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he did not think the Amendment necessary after the alteration which had been made in the clause when the Report was under consideration.

LORD ABERDARE thought that if some such Proviso as that proposed by the Chairman of Committees were not adopted, a modification affecting private property might be sanctioned without the assent of Parliament.

LORD SELBORNE thought that an Amendment such as that suggested by his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees was desirable.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was not convinced, but after the opinion expressed by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne) and other noble Friends he would urge his noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) to accept the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it was a disadvantage that their Lordships had not before them a copy of the Bill as amended on the Report. After the Amendment introduced by his noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) on the Report, it was provided by the clause that any modification must be laid before Parliament; but it was not provided that the modification should be confirmed by Parliament. It appeared to him that there was no inconsistency between the Amendment introduced by his noble Friend and that now proposed by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. He would suggest that the Amendment of his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) should be attached to the end of the clause.

Amendment agreed to; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

Lord Redesdale

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.

(The Lord Hampton.)

(NO. 102.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Abusing a girl under 12 years of age.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved to leave out ("twelve") and insert ("thirteen.")

LORD HAMPTON objected to the alteration.

LORD COLERIDGE said, that he saw no reason for the alteration. Surely an offence committed on a girl under 13 was as bad as if it was committed on a girl under 12.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Abusing a girl above 12 years of age and under 13 years of age.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved to omit the clause.

After a conversation which was mostly inaudible,

Amendment agreed to; Clause struck out.

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 158.)

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET asked the Lord President, Whether the consolidation Clauses of the Public Health Bill would be distinguished from the amendment Clauses?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: A statement will be prepared and circulated showing the clauses which contain amendments of the existing law. The statement will be in two parts, the first corresponding with the statements circulated in the House of Commons on the introduction of the Bill, and the second part showing the amendments made in the Bill by the House of Commons.

SALMON FISHERY ACT PROVISIONAL ORDER (TAW AND TORRIDGE) BILL [H.L.]

IRELAND—CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a statement, in the Report of the Controller and Auditor General, upon the account of the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland, for the year 1874, presented to Parliament on the 9th instant, in reference to two Reports recently presented to Parliament by the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant and of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, in these words—

"I will point out the great public inconvenience that would arise if the permission granted to the Commissioners were to be held as a precedent upon which every public accountant might claim the privilege of animadverting upon the reports of the head of this department made, in the unavoidable and conscientious discharge of his statutory functions. His duties, it need not be said, are already sufficiently onerous and invidious, and his position would become well-nigh intolerable, if the further task were forced upon him of engaging in controversial written discussions with public accountants, who be-

Whether this does not express the rule by which the relations of the Auditor General to Public Accountants are regulated; and, if so, what were the peculiar circumstances which led to a departure from this rule in the case of the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners; whether the Lords of the Treasury will take measures to bring the controversy between the Commissioners and the Auditor General to an end; whether his attention has been called to the fact that the expense of the Commission has increased in the inverse ratio to the amount of duties to be performed, viz.: from 1871, when a very large amount of business, specified in the Report, was done, and payments were made amounting to £4,890,000, the cost of the Commission was £28,389, whereas in 1874 the Commissioners stated that their duties as a compensating body had been practically completed, and the payments of the year only amounted to £264,212, the cost of the Commission had risen to £32,409; and, whether any means will be taken of ascertaining the reasons of their increased cost of administration?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, there is no necessity for the Treasury to interfere between the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland and the Auditor General, even if they had the power, which they have not. The question is in the House of Commons. The House of Commons has appointed a Committee of Public Accounts, before whom all these transactions are now investigated, and it would be highly improper if the opinion of the Government upon any subject of controversy which the Committee had to investigate could be extracted by means of asking a Question. The subject of the relations existing between the Auditor General and the Commissioners is one which it would have been well to bring under the consideration of the House in a different way. With regard to the expense of the Commission, I may say in the general interest of economy the Treasury watch the expenditure of public money under any circumstances with severe scrutiny, but nothing has occurred in the present case to render their interference necessary.

 (The Lord Steward.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3*."
 —(The Lord Steward.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said,
 that before their Lordships proceeded to the third reading of the Bill, he wished to make a few remarks, not in any spirit
 of opposition, but by way of observation
 on the practical working of the Bill.
 He would, in the first place, ask their

would do, and what it would not do. It seemed to him that the area of what it would not do was much larger than that of what it would do. Firstly, it did not attack the case of the smaller towns; next, although it dealt with very large areas, it did not deal with the dwellings of agricultural labourers; but, as their Lordships well knew, the disgraceful state of those dwellings in many parts of the Kingdom could not be denied. In the second place, there was a graver charge against it—the limits as to population laid down in the Bill were such that the measure would not attack the case of the smaller towns. Why? He ventured to think that the action of such a measure would be more beneficial in the case of towns below the limit of population laid down in the Bill than it would be in that of towns above it, and for this good reason—that in the large towns there was far more public spirit and far better means of dealing with the dwellings of the poor than was the case in the smaller towns. Whenever, in the course of the discussions on the Bill, a complaint was made of the want of stringency in its enactments, some one on the Treasury Bench rose and said it was very important to look to the public spirit existing in the large towns. If half that was said on that score were true they might have been trusted to apply like Edinburgh and Glasgow for local Acts, so that in the matters to which this Bill related the large towns had, to a very great extent, the remedy in their own hands. It was not so with the small towns—they might, perhaps, possess a Local Board, but they had not the same wealth or public spirit. Yet for these the Bill did nothing. If comparisons were not odious, he might liken the conduct of the framers of the Bill to that of a certain Levite, who pursued his way to Jericho—being intent, no doubt, on great public matters—and passed by the aggravated case that lay on his way. In like manner the Government, intent on great measures, had passed by the unwholesome areas of small towns in their haste to alleviate the condition of the larger. As regarded the clearing away of unwholesome areas and the pulling down of unhealthy structures in large towns, he saw no reason why the Bill should not effect good; but he feared that its machinery was not very effective—it appeared to him to be cumbrous and expensive, and in addition to this the process of getting to work would be a very long one. This would be the process: First, two justices of the peace or two ratepayers would go to the Medical Officer and point out the unhealthy area; the Medical Officer then made his report to the Local Authority; the Local Authority "take it into their consideration;" they then pass a resolution that the area was unhealthy; after passing that resolution they make an improvement scheme; having completed it, they were to announce its existence in the newspapers during the three autumn months; in the ensuing month they were to serve a notice on the owners and occupiers; they must then present a Petition to the Secretary of State or the Local Government Board for a confirming order; and, lastly, the confirming authority were thereupon to order an inquiry. It could not therefore be said that the procedure was unduly rapid, while it might almost be called cumbrous. Moreover, he feared two results—first, that when the Bill was passed and brought into operation, even should it accomplish its object, the carrying out of schemes under the Bill would entail considerable loss; and, secondly, he feared that the ejected persons would not be accommodated. There would be the cost of buying and pulling down houses. This, he feared, would provoke a cry on the part of the ratepayers, and have the effect of making the Bill extremely unpopular, and in that way hinder its working. An endeavour would be made to recoup by selling the land for the erection of model lodging-houses or by erecting such houses; but, looking to the great cost of building in large towns, it was to be apprehended that the people who had been unhoused by the pulling down of the rookeries in which they had lived would not be able to find in the new buildings dwellings at the rent which they could afford. He would place before their Lordships an illustrative case. In the course of the debates on this Bill a good deal had been said of what had been done in Glasgow and Edinburgh. Now, the case of Edinburgh was not analogous to many which would have to be dealt with under the Bill. Edinburgh was a town in which there was a great deal of space; and, further, in that town a provision was made that before

500 persons were ejected sufficient accommodation must be provided for them elsewhere. The conditions there were therefore exceedingly favourable. But what was the result? The local authority was urged there to build some model dwelling houses as an experiment and an example. They accordingly, on a piece of land worth at least £2,000, built a block of houses which cost £6,972. So that the total cost of the undertaking might be roughly estimated at £9,000. The houses were sold by public auction, and eagerly bought, chiefly by the better class of working men, not exactly the class it was intended to benefit. Six or eight shops at the time he received his information still remained on hand, and supposing these to realize £250 each, it would make the total return for this expenditure of £9,000—£6,200. There were four deductions to be made from this example—1. It implied a direct payment from the rates for the benefit of a particular class. 2. The class benefited was not the class ejected or intended to be benefited. 3. Provision was not thereby made for the ejected occupiers. 4. The transaction involved a loss of 30 per cent. But it might be argued under this Bill private contractors were to build the houses. But even then they would not allow the loss to fall on them so that the expense and the failure would be the same. He however regarded the Bill as a well-intentioned effort on the part of Her Majesty's Government, although he considered its machinery cumbrous, its operations likely to be expensive, and its provisions for giving accommodation to ejected tenants likely to be inadequate.

EARL NELSON said, that everybody seemed to think it necessary to give this measure their support, but, like the noble Earl who had just sat down, that support was what might be called back-handed and half-hearted. The noble Earl complained that the operation of the Act would not be quick enough; but, for his own part, he was glad its action was not too rapid, as that might create evils as great as those proposed to be remedied. The people really had to be educated as to what was necessary to be done. There was a remarkable and rapidly-growing tendency amongst the rural population to move from the country into the towns, which made it

of national importance that the health of the towns should be cared for. In France, in recruiting for their army from the country districts, they would summons 13,000 conscripts for 10,000 soldiers, but in the towns and manufacturing districts they had to summons 23,000 conscripts for the same number of soldiers, in one case having to reject only 3,000 in the other 13,000. He had been told that the inhabitants of the back slums of Westminster were in the habit of drinking spirits deliberately late at night with the view of making themselves drunk, because otherwise it would not be possible for them to sleep in their wretched dwellings. Feeling that the operations contemplated by this Bill would do much in the long run to lessen the temptations to drunkenness and promote the health of the people, he heartily supported the third reading.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in reference to the remarks of the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery), said, they were a condensation of all that had been said in opposition to the Bill during its progress through Parliament. The argument was—first, it was a very good Bill; then it was a Bill that would do no good at all; and then why was it not extended to small towns? There were several reasons why the Bill should not be applied to small towns. The system required for small towns was quite a different one from that which was called for in the case of large towns. The evil complained of was not that the population was dense in particular areas, but that the people were crowded in rookeries that were destitute of the proper sanitary arrangements. Some blocks of model lodging-houses contained, for the superficial ground area, a larger number of inhabitants than the condemned dwellings which had stood in the same places. Now, as a rule, these rookeries did not exist in small towns; and the Sanitary Authorities had already sufficient powers to deal with any nuisances that might arise with them.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

LORD REDESDALE again objected to the 12th clause as it then stood. It gave the Secretary of State and the Local Government Board powers over the property of persons such as had never hitherto been exercised except by Par-

"Provided always, that if such modification or alteration shall require a larger public expenditure than that sanctioned by the former scheme, or the taking of any property otherwise than by agreement, or shall affect injuriously other property in a manner different to that proposed in the former scheme without the consent of the owner and occupier of any such property, it must be made by a provisional order to be confirmed by Act of Parliament in the manner provided in Section six of this Act on the completion of an improvement scheme."

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he did not think the Amendment necessary after the alteration which had been made in the clause when the Report was under consideration.

LORD ABERDARE thought that if some such Proviso as that proposed by the Chairman of Committees were not adopted, a modification affecting private property might be sanctioned without the assent of Parliament.

LORD SELBORNE thought that an Amendment such as that suggested by his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees was desirable.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was not convinced, but after the opinion expressed by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne) and other noble Friends he would urge his noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) to accept the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it was a disadvantage that their Lordships had not before them a copy of the Bill as amended on the Report. After the Amendment introduced by his noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) on the Report, it was provided by the clause that any modification must be laid before Parliament; but it was not provided that the modification should be confirmed by Parliament. It appeared to him that there was no inconsistency between the Amendment introduced by his noble Friend and that now proposed by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. He would suggest that the Amendment of his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) should be attached to the end of the clause.

Amendment agreed to; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

Lord Redesdale

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.

(NO. 102.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Abusing a girl under 12 years of age.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved to leave out ("twelve") and insert ("thirteen.")

LORD HAMPTON objected to the alteration.

LORD COLERIDGE said, that he saw no reason for the alteration. Surely an offence committed on a girl under 13 was as bad as if it was committed on a girl under 12.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Abusing a girl above 12 years of age and under 13 years of age.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved to omit the clause.

After a conversation which was mostly inaudible,

Amendment agreed to; Clause struck out.

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 158.)

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET asked the Lord President, Whether the consolidation Clauses of the Public Health Bill would be distinguished from the amendment Clauses?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: A statement will be prepared and circulated showing the clauses which contain amendments of the existing law. The statement will be in two parts, the first corresponding with the statements circulated in the House of Commons on the introduction of the Bill, and the second part showing the amendments made in the Bill by the House of Commons.

SALMON FISHERY ACT PROVISIONAL ORDER (TAW AND TORRIDGE) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for confirming a Provisional Order made by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State in pursuance of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, relating to the Taw and

CANADA COPYRIGHT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to give effect to an Act of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada respecting Copyright—Was presented by The Earl of CARNARVON; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 157.)

House adjourned at a quarter before

IRELAND—CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a statement, in the Report of the Controller and Auditor General, upon the account of the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland, for the year 1874, presented to Parliament on the 9th instant, in reference to two Reports recently presented to Parliament by the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant and of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, in these words—

"I will point out the great public inconvenience that would arise if the permission granted to the Commissioners were to be held as a precedent upon which every public accountant might claim the privilege of animadverting upon the reports of the head of this department made, in the unavoidable and conscientious discharge of his statutory functions. His duties, it need not be said, are already sufficiently onerous and invidious, and his position would become well-nigh intolerable, if the further task were forced upon him of engaging in controversial written discussions with public accountants, who be-

Whether this does not express the rule by which the relations of the Auditor General to Public Accountants are regulated; and, if so, what were the peculiar circumstances which led to a departure from this rule in the case of the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners; whether the Lords of the Treasury will take measures to bring the controversy between the Commissioners and the Auditor General to an end; whether his attention has been called to the fact that the expense of the Commission has increased in the inverse ratio to the amount of duties to be performed, viz.: from 1871, when a very large amount of business, specified in the Report, was done, and payments were made amounting to £4,890,000, the cost of the Commission was £28,389, whereas in 1874 the Commissioners stated that their duties as a compensating body had been practically completed, and the payments of the year only amounted to £264,212, the cost of the Commission had risen to £32,409; and, whether any means will be taken of ascertaining the reasons of their increased cost of administration?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, there is no necessity for the Treasury to interfere between the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland and the Auditor General, even if they had the power, which they have not. The question is in the House of Commons. The House of Commons has appointed a Committee of Public Accounts, before whom all these transactions are now investigated, and it would be highly improper if the opinion of the Government upon any subject of controversy which the Committee had to investigate could be extracted by means of asking a Question. The subject of the relations existing between the Auditor General and the Commissioners is one which it would have been well to bring under the consideration of the House in a different way. With regard to the expense of the Commission, I may say in the general interest of economy the Treasury watch the expenditure of public money under any circumstances with severe scrutiny, but nothing has occurred in the present case to render their interference necessary.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—THE PUBLIC MUSEUMS.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Police doing duty at the South Kensington Museum are paid at the same rate as the Police doing duty at the National Gallery, British Museum, and India Museum, or whether it is the case that the extra pay received by them for extra duty, and their gratuity at Christmas, still leave them with less pay than the Police employed at the other Museums?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the ordinary rates of pay to the Police employed in these duties were absolutely identical, but with respect to the gratuities paid for services they rendered the amount was optional in the several departments. While the Inspector at the British Museum received £40 a-year, the Inspector at South Kensington received only £20. The police-sergeants and constables at the British Museum, National Gallery, and India Museum received an allowance at the rate of 1s. a-day, or £18 5s. a-year, while the sergeants at South Kensington received, two of them, £15, and one £10; and the constables received £5 15s. per annum for the extra work performed by them.

PRESTON COUNTY COURT.—QUESTION.

MR. HERMON asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to the inadequate accommodation provided in the County Court Office at Preston for the transaction of the ordinary business, and of the extraordinary business arising out of the Bankruptcy and Admiralty Jurisdictions attached to that Court; to the inconvenience to the solicitors and suitors arising from the sittings of the Court being held at the County Sessions Hall, which is situated nearly a mile from the offices; and, whether, upon the expiration of the lease under which the present offices are held, there is any prospect of proper accommodation being provided, and of the court and offices being united under the same roof?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, an effort would be made next year to amalgamate under one roof the offices of the Preston County Court.

THE LABOUR LAWS.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, as he proposes to let "The Master and Servant Act, 1867," expire, he will repeal the Acts suspended by the first Schedule of that Act; and, whether he proposes to repeal the whole, or any part of "The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871," as also Clause 4 of "The Trades Union Act of 1871," in so far as it forbids the enforcing of certain contracts made between workmen who have associated themselves, and between the societies they have formed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he thought he had already made clear his intention to repeal such parts of those Acts as were contained in the Schedule of "The Master and Servant Act" as were affected by the Employers and Workmen Bill. There were one or two provisions not relating to the special subject of the Bill which might have to be retained, but all the rest would be repealed. The Government thought "The Criminal Law Amendment Act" ought to remain in force, and he had no intention of touching "the Trades Union Act" in any way. The object of the Government was to carry out what they believed was the intention of the Act of 1871, and do away with the effect of the judicial interpretation which had been put upon Section 4 of "The Trades Union Act." The statutable Law of Conspiracy in Clause 3 of "The Conspiracy and Protection of Property Bill" simply related to those conspiracies which were distinctly made crimes, and recognized by Acts of Parliament as conspiracies.

BOARD OF TRADE (RAILWAY DEPARTMENT)—GOVERNMENT OFFICERS ON FOREIGN RAILWAYS.

QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will state to the House the grounds upon which Her Majesty's Government have given their permission to an office, of the British Government to act, at the request of the Ottoman Government, as arbiter in matters in dispute between that Government and a railway contractor; and, whether the statement made in this House last year by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to the employment of Captain Tyler by the Erie Railway Company, that—is not opposed to the present employment of Captain Tyler?

"If the application had been made to the President of the Board of Trade for an officer to inquire and report, it would be impossible that the application could have been entertained,"

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I do not think there is any similarity between the case which was treated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year and the one to which the Question of the hon. Member refers. Last year it was the case of an officer of the Board of Trade, who it was contemplated should be employed in assisting the labours and forwarding the interests of a private company; and, for my own part, I could not too strongly reprobate the employment of those who are in the service of Her Majesty for the interest of private companies. The case to which the hon. Gentleman now refers is of a totally different character. The Ottoman Government has appointed a Commission to examine generally into the efficiency and sufficiency of the railroads which they have recently established. They have, I believe, appointed two eminent English engineers as members of the Commission, and they made a formal application to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for permission on the part of the Government to Captain Tyler to join the Commission. Lord Derby applied to the Board of Trade in reference to the matter, and expressed his opinion that if it were not a great deviation from Departmental arrangement and etiquette he should be glad if the Board could accede to the application of the Ottoman Government. It would be, as Lord Derby pointed out, not only an act of great courtesy to the Government, but it was believed that it would assist them in one of the most important matters they had in hand—namely, the sufficiency of their railroads. It was, therefore, considered to be in a certain sense a diplomatic appointment, as well as an appointment of the kind to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and which he associates with that which occupied the notice of Parliament last year. It was, of course, a matter of discretion on the part of the Government, and especially of the President of the Board of Trade, and I think that in complying with the suggestion of Lord Derby he acted discreetly. I believe, further, that the course which has been taken will be beneficial to the country and to an ally in whose prosperity we take an interest.

THE TICHBORNE TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JUDGES—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY. QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked Mr. Attorney General, with reference to the Petitions which have been presented to this House as to the conduct of the Court of Queen's Bench in respect of Contempt of Court in the Tichborne case, Whether he has any objection to propose that a Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the allegations as to misconduct on the part of the Judges in that respect; and especially to inquire into and report upon the charges specifically stated in the Petitions from Peterborough?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I have to state first, that I have no intention of proposing the appointment of a Committee to inquire into and report upon the allegations contained in the Petitions presented to the House imputing misconduct to the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in respect of the cases of Contempt of Court which occurred during the progress of the Tichborne trial; secondly, that, while I desire to pay respectful attention to the contents of all such Petitions presented to the House as are brought to my notice, I feel that I should be failing in my duty were I to propose the appointment of a Committee of the House to inquire into the allegations referred to by the hon. Member, but which appear to me to be based upon a perversion or misapprehension of the true state of the facts; and, thirdly, that I see no reason for any exception from the views which I have just expressed in respect of the charges referred to by the hon. Member as being specifically stated in the Petitions from Peterborough.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.

QUESTION. BILL WITHDRAWN.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to consider the best mode of providing for the preservation of Ancient Monuments, either by supporting the Ancient Monuments Bill in another Session, or by introducing themselves some other measure with the same object?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that last year he stated, on behalf of the Treasury, the objections they entertained to the Bill then introduced by the hon. Baronet. When the hon. Baronet this Session introduced a Bill, which was substantially the same, he (not being able to be present) asked his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury to repeat in substance the objections which he urged a year ago. He could not hold out any prospect to the hon. Baronet of his being able to support the Bill in its present form, but considering the interest which had been expressed on the subject, and having regard to the vote taken on the Motion for the Second Reading, he should be ready to consult with his Colleagues in the Autumn in order to see whether the object of the hon. Baronet could in any way be attained.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman he would not persevere with his Bill in the present Session. He, therefore, moved that the Order for Committee on the Bill be read and discharged.

Motion agreed to.

Bill withdrawn.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1854—SURVEY OF PASSENGER STEAMERS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that passenger steamers are ordinarily surveyed by only one surveyor; and whether that is in contravention of Section 309 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854?"

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, passenger steamers were sometimes surveyed by two or more, sometimes by one surveyor. In all cases the hull was surveyed by a surveyor competent to survey hulls, and the engines by a surveyor specially competent to survey machinery. These duties were sometimes done by the same person.

Sir John Lubbock

In consequence of the great change from wood to iron the same class of persons were often employed as skilled in both duties; and this was not in contravention of the 309th section of the Act of 1854, but strictly in carrying out its spirit and intention.

CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT—NORWICH ELECTION.

ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to Your Majesty that Sir Robert Lush, knight, one of the Justices of the Court of Queen Bench at Westminster, and one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," has reported to the House of Commons that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last Election for the City of Norwich:

"We therefore humbly pray Your Majesty, that Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause inquiry to be made, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Parliament passed in the sixteenth year of the reign of Your Majesty, intituled, 'An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament,' by the appointment of John Morgan Howard, esquire, one of Her Majesty's Counsel, Patrick M'Mahon, esquire, barrister at law, and Gabriel Prior Goldney, esquire, barrister at law, as Commissioners, for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices."

The hon. and learned Gentleman reminded the hon. Member for Peterborough, who had an Amendment on the Paper, that the existing Act of Parliament provided for an extension of the inquiry as suggested by his Amendment.

MR. WHALLEY said his Amendment had been placed on the Paper through a misapprehension of the Act. He considered the circumstances under which the inquiry was proposed were most unusual, and declared that he had been actuated throughout in any part he had taken in the matter at the instance of what he believed, and must still believe, was the general feeling in the city of Norwich—namely, that they had been treated with considerable harshness, that there was no necessity at all for the inquiry, that the learned Judge investigated only two out of the eight wards, and that there could be no public object whatever in incurring this large expenditure. All that was known at the inquiry was known at the previous inquiry, for so long as they got gentlemen to find money to pay messengers there would be plenty of messengers ready to accept that money under the circumstances.

DR. KENEALY wished to ask the House whether there ought not to be some re-arrangement of the section of the Act under which the present proceedings were taken? Norwich was a very large constituency, containing 12,000 or 13,000 electors, and it seemed very hard upon an electoral body of that magnitude that if some 200 or 300 persons were addicted to corrupt practices it should tend to disqualify the great and pure body of the electors. He thought, therefore, the House might consider whether there should not be some line drawn—whether any city like Norwich ought to be disfranchised because a small minority were addicted to corrupt practices. He thought the Attorney General might before now have moved for this Commission, because he was afraid the result of granting it now would be that none of the Commissioners would find it either convenient or expedient to attend during the remainder of the Session, but would defer their sittings until the vacation, and the consequence would be that Norwich would be disfranchised until the meeting of Parliament next year. That would be a great hardship. It would have been infinitely better if the Attorney General had selected gentlemen who could immediately have proceeded to sit upon the Commission and make their Report to the House as speedily as possible, so that the disgrace of being disfranchised might not rest upon that great city until next year.

MR. BRIGHT: I entirely approve of the course which the Attorney General has taken in moving for the appointment of this Commission. The hon. Member for Stoke speaks possibly with more knowledge of the condition of Norwich than I have; but I am informed that there is a good deal of corruption in that city, and that it is not confined to 200 or 300 people. Norwich has been a very corrupt constituency for a long time. I recollect being there rather more than 30 years ago, and being at a dinner-party at the house of the then Mayor of Norwich. It was at a time when we were engaged in discussing the question of the repeal of the Corn Laws, and we remonstrated with the gentlemen present upon the fact that although the general belief was that there was a Liberal majority in the place, still the borough was represented by a Conservative on the one side and a Liberal on the other. We asked them why they could not get their representation in something like harmony with the understood opinion of the city?—and the answer was that the corruption of a certain portion of the constituency was so great and apparently so incurable, that the respectable and good men on both sides had agreed that it was far better to divide the representation in that way than to bring upon the city the terrible calamity of the corruption which occurred at every period of a contested election. From that time to this, as is well known to those connected with Norwich, there has been a great deal of corruption there. There have been Petitions and a Commission before this, and yet there seems to have been no cure. I have a letter from a gentleman of that city, whose name I do not mean to publish; but I believe the hon. Gentleman who now sits for Norwich will be able to state that the writer is a respectable man and likely to be well informed. The writer says—

“The city is on both sides of politics held in thrall by some 600 or 800—though some say there are double the number—of persons who will not vote without money or beer, and will vote for anybody with those two articles.”

That gentleman is very anxious that the Commission should go back even as far as the last Commission. I suspect by the law it will not be able to do that; but at least they can go back to the election of last year, because, after all, if the House intends really to effect a cure it is very desirable that it should know if possible, the extent of the disease, and I am satisfied from what I know, and have known for the last 30 years, that there is an amount of corruption in Norwich which it is necessary should be exposed. I suspect, however, that the corruption is not of the kind that it used to be. It is now more the abject class of the electors who take the bribe of a day's pay or of a little beer.

It is comprised I presume, of that class which I described some years ago as "the residuum," which there is, unfortunately, in every constituency, and which must necessarily be larger in very large constituencies. The more you extend the franchise the more it is probable you will find that residuum; but having done so, it is desirable that the House should be very severe, and resolve to convince the least political and the least moral that it is of great importance that elections should be pure. I am afraid that in Norwich the gentlemen of the two parties—I mean the leaders—have not taken the part which they ought to have taken and might have taken in this matter. I have seen some cases—the case of the borough of Rochdale, in which I live, is a very striking one—in which, after the Reform Bill, there was great corruption, and public-houses were opened, I am sorry to say, even by the party with which I have always been associated. The opposition—I mean the Conservatives—opened the public-houses six weeks, and our people opened them for the two days of the election. After the election, when the six weeks' opening of public-houses had prevailed over the two days' opening, the committee of the Liberal Party met and determined by a most solemn resolution that they would never again have anything to do with an election or a candidate by whom or by whose committee any public-house was opened or any other form of corruption practised; and from that time to this no candidate of the Liberal Party in Rochdale has been allowed to canvass or to pay any portion of his expenses, and the borough has been so far purified that the action of the Liberal Party has introduced a very great reform on the part of their opponents, and I believe now that there is probably not a more incorrupt constituency in the Kingdom. That, however, was not because the people liable to be tempted were better than others also liable, but because the leading men of a Party—and now, I believe, the leading men of both Parties—are anxious absolutely to discourage and prevent any corruption whatever. I beg to say in the presence of Gentlemen who must know a great deal about it that all the Parliament and law can do cannot cure evils of this kind among the poor and abject and ignorant, unless the candidates themselves and their friends and committees do all that lies in their power to make the law understood and the law respected. I am very glad that this Commission is to be appointed. I hope it will be able to go into this affair, and that Norwich at last may be lifted up from the mud of corruption in which it has been so long standing, and be made at least as respectable as the most respectable constituency in the Kingdom.

MR. COLMAN said, the House would believe him when he stated that it was with considerable embarrassment that he rose to address it on the subject under discussion. There was a wholesome rule that a Member should not take part when a matter in which he was personally interested was under discussion. This rule might be properly extended to the case of constituencies; but after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, he begged the indulgence of the House while he stated a few of the facts of the case. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the fact that the law was not properly understood. It was the want of definition and distinctness which had caused much of the evil which had arisen. What had taken place in Norwich, he believed, arose from lax views on this subject, and not from corrupt motives. He had made inquiry in Norwich and was told that there were reasons in that city which might not apply to other places why a considerable employment of messengers was necessary. He was told that between October, when the register was made up, and the election in March, there had been 270 changes of residence in one ward alone. This ward represented about a fourth or fifth of the entire constituency. In a poor constituency like Norwich, removals were frequent, and hence the necessity of employing more messengers than were required in some larger and wealthier constituencies. Mr. Justice Lush had referred to the difficult position in which he was placed through the inquiry ceasing, or, rather, collapsing; but he (Mr. Colman), on behalf of his late Colleague (Mr. Tillet), wished the House to know the circumstances under which that inquiry collapsed, and he thought a useful lesson might be learnt from the statement he had to make. There was a clause in the Corrupt Practices Act which required a deposit of £1,000 to be made as a security for costs. He presumed that sum was named in order that it might represent a fair amount of security. He believed that at the time of the passing of the Act there was a hope that the cost of those petitions would be very much reduced. Unfortunately they knew that the cost of Election Petitions had not been reduced. At the outset of this inquiry the counsel for the petitioner intimated that his case would occupy at least three weeks. The petitioner was a man of whom he did not wish to speak in any way disrespectfully, but he was a man in the receipt of weekly wages which did not represent anything like £2; perhaps £1 10s. would be more like the mark. He deposited £1,000, but that sum was not found by himself but by some other gentlemen behind him. His counsel stated, then, that the case would take three weeks, and this the House would remember meant a minimum cost of £500 per day. That was to say, that Mr. Tillet had the risk of fighting for his seat at a minimum cost of nearly £10,000, and if he were successful he could only recover £1,000. However clever that course might be, it was not one that was conducive to justice or to the honour and dignity of the House. On the general question, he had simply to say that those with whom he acted, and many on the other side, did not shrink in any degree from this inquiry. While it might be a matter of great pain that the city should be subjected to the imputation, he trusted that good would come out of the inquiry. His belief was that when the Report of the Commissioners was presented, the aspect of the case would be different. He hoped at any rate that the inquiry would be a thorough one, and that it would be prosecuted with earnestness and vigour. He did not think that long inquiries were conducive to justice; for witnesses talked to each other, and if the inquiry extended over many weeks, the evidence must receive a colouring. He did not desire to enter into a discussion of any of the offences with which Norwich had been charged; but he wished to refer to a very useful Return made on the Motion of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. W. U. Heygate) of the total expenses of each candidate, and the number of votes for each at the election for 1874. He commended that Return to the notice of Members, who would see how much constituencies differed from each other. And while Norwich was not free from blame in the matter, it would be found that it was not blacker than a great many other constituencies. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen would look at it not only with the view of comparing the costs of constituencies, but of comparing the cost of one candidate with another; and it would be found useful to see what had been the cost per vote of the contests. He thanked the House for having listened to him so patiently. He hoped that this inquiry would be a complete and thorough one, and that Norwich would once again occupy the proud position it once held.

MR. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him that there was a good deal of hypocrisy in all these discussions on the subject of bribery. A strong opinion adverse to electoral corruption was always expressed in the House, and it was supposed that this sentiment was shared in out-of-doors:—but as far as his experience went he was inclined to believe that there was no feeling of moral turpitude either in or out-of-doors as regarded bribery. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had adverted to what he termed “the abject classes”—presumably the class of persons most liable to the temptations of bribery. But the right hon. Gentleman had long been distinguished throughout his brilliant career for his earnest efforts in lowering the franchise, and so had himself been the means of introducing the class of persons most likely to bring about the terrible calamity of which he complained. The right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to cast the blame on the candidates; but he (Mr. Bentinck) had never understood that if there were two parties to an offence blame could only attach to one of them. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House most distinctly that the cause of this calamity was the lowering of the franchise in boroughs, of which he had himself been one of the most distinguished advocates. He (Mr. Bentinck) would contend that neither the House nor the country had any right to complain of bribery so long as the system of voting by ballot was retained. Was there one Member present who would rise and say that the ballot did not offer opportunity to bribery? No doubt a case of corruption might now and then be detected under the ballot system; but for every one found out hundreds escaped discovery.

MR. RATHBONE said, he could not allow the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Bentinck) to pass without making some observations upon them. The hon. Member's speech, if it meant anything at all, meant the palliation of those who, having wealth, education, and knowledge, exposed their poorer countrymen to the temptation of bribery. The hon. Gentleman was, however, as wrong in his facts as he was in his morality. One thing was evident, that where the higher classes had set themselves against bribery it had ceased to prevail. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) only gave an account as regarded his own borough, but it was such as other hon. Members could give of their boroughs. He was afraid it was known to too many that the town which he had the honour to represent, and which he should not have felt it an honour to represent at one time, was once as notorious for its corruption as it was now for its purity. [Laughter.] Well, he would say that it was once as notorious for its corruption as it was now remarkable for its purity. He believed that at the last few elections, on neither side, whether on the part of the candidates or those acting on their behalf, had there been any bribery whatever, or any money spent in drink. This result was produced by the expression of opinion, and determination on the part of those who had the welfare of the town at heart, that bribery should not be allowed to exist; and, if it were necessary, there would be no want of funds and determination to punish those who, having education, wealth, and other advantages on their side, should resort to a practice which—although contrary to the opinion of the hon. Member who had just sat down—he, for one, considered degrading to the man who practised it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had stated that bribery must depend on the goodwill of the upper classes, and the hon. Member for Liverpool had just confirmed that statement. If it were true that the upper classes countenanced bribery, there was under a system of secret voting no means of detecting that corruption. Corrupt practices could now be traced only when they were practised among the "residuum" of the population—under the system of open voting it was perfectly competent to trace corruption, if such existed, either to the upper or lower classes. He believed that the old system of open voting was abandoned simply because it exposed the corruption of the upper classes, and that the mode of taking votes by ballot would soon be found to be as efficacious here as experience had shown it to be in the United States.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT (re-committed) BILL.—[Bill 116.]

(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

MR. T. E. SMITH, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, namely—

"That, in the opinion of this House, no measure affecting Merchant Shipping can be deemed satisfactory which does not as far as practicable guard against ships sailing under foreign flags being at an advantage as compared with those under the British flag."

said, that when he had looked into the Bill he came to the conclusion that it was a very weak measure. Clauses had been introduced which would place our merchant shipping at a great disadvantage, yet it would not do much to promote the views that some persons had at heart. He thought the shipowners of this country had a right to be considered. When the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade sacrificed his Easter vacation, and went about the country endeavouring to obtain all the information he could, it showed his earnestness in the work, and it was hoped from what he said, both in public and a private, that something would be proposed in the present Bill to alleviate the unpleasant and vexatious position in which the ship-

owners found themselves placed. In his opinion, it would have been far better if the right hon. Gentleman had at the commencement of the Session moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the matter. By this time their investigation would have been concluded, and the House would have had a much more practicable Bill to consider. The measure now before the House would do very little good and very little harm. It would not materially affect either the sailors, the shipowners, or the merchants. An extraordinary change in connection with British shipping had taken place of late years. The passage to India had been much shortened by the construction of the Suez Canal, trade had been revolutionized by the introduction of steam, and the English Mercantile Marine had attained a pre-eminence over that of other countries such as it had never had before. Therefore, we ought to be specially careful lest by any legislative interference we should give a check to this progress. The shipowners did not desire a return to Protection—on the contrary, every ship coming into a British port, whether under a British or foreign flag, should be under the same rules and regulations. But, as the case at present stood, a foreign ship in one of our ports might be overlaid or unseaworthy, and we gave no protection to the crew, while the English shipowner was placed under burdensome restrictions and regulations. In fact, the foreign shipowner trading in English ports had advantages in every way which the British shipowner did not possess. This was not the way to encourage the growth of a vast commerce. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman himself seemed to be afraid that his legislation would have an injurious effect by driving ships into the foreign trade, for he had introduced clauses to impede the transfer of British ships into foreign hands. He (Mr. T. E. Smith) would like to know why the right hon. Gentleman had introduced clauses which would impede a British shipowner in selling his ship to a foreigner if he chose to do so? He feared that the Bill would interfere very much with the shipbuilding trade in this country. A great many foreign ships were built here, and when the shipbuilder wished to have a vessel registered as a foreign ship, why should he be required to get evidence on the subject—it might be from China or San Francisco? Such clauses as these would require very great consideration in Committee. He came now to what he believed to be the best part of the Bill, and that was the clauses which dealt with the "advance notes." The general opinion of those who took a warm, practical interest in the welfare of the sailor was that nothing better could be done than to abolish the advance note, which simply enabled him to lead a life of debauchery for a few days, after which he went on board in a totally unfit state. We had heard much about unseaworthy ships, but had not so fully understood the question of unseaworthy crews. He himself had lately had a large ship going to sea, and every man of the crew had to be carried on board, and had to be looked after for 24 hours, until he had become sufficiently sober to undertake his duty. But here arose an important consideration—what was to become of the wives and families of the men? There were large numbers of sailors who were sober and respectable, and many of them had wives and families whom they were as anxious to support as Members of this House could be to support theirs. If the present law were to remain as it was with the additions this Bill proposed, they would have no means of providing for their families. At present there were two ways of doing so—the advance note, which was to be abolished, and the allotment note, by which the seaman's wife or relatives were able to get month by month payments not exceeding half the wages which the man had earned. But at present allotment notes were given only to the superior classes of seamen, such as the boatswain, carpenter, and so on. Unless the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to deal with this question of the allotment note, it would be the greatest injustice to allow sailors to go to sea while no provision was made for their wives and families. The Bill also gave an inducement to the "crimps" to ship sailors under foreign flags, because they need not to be taken before shipping masters and could have advance notes. In this way foreign ships would be placed in a better position than British ships. Then the Bill was bristling with penalties for breaches of discipline, and he doubted the wisdom of that. As a matter of fact, penalties were very seldom enforced; but we should not promote the security of our ships or the good feeling which should prevail between the officers and crew if we loaded the Bill with penalties. If, instead of heavy penalties, there were more moderate ones which could be easily enforced, we should, he believed, go a long way to insure better discipline on board our ships. It was also most desirable, in his opinion, that any plan for the improvement of the look-out on board should be adopted with the view of preventing collisions. As to the clauses which came under the important head of safety, he had already expressed it to be his opinion that the right hon. Gentleman had pursued the right line with respect to the question of loading ships; but, representing as he did a constituency which was composed almost entirely of shipowners and seamen, he was continually receiving letters pointing out the hardship in the case of ships which had been going to sea for years, carrying the same cargo and with the same draught of water, of the vessels themselves being stopped and the reputation of their owners impugned because some one chose to report that the ships were overloaded. There should, he maintained, be some way of ascertaining the views of the Board of Trade with regard to the depth to which a ship might be immersed. Ships were now very often improperly stopped, and then the character of the Government officer was saved by the shipowner being called upon to make some small and unimportant alteration in the loading. Shipowners ought not to be subjected to this vexatious interference. Among these safety clauses was a very extraordinary one, Clause 37, which indeed appeared to be a complete Bill in itself. It dealt with a question which was not connected with safety—he meant the question of the measurement of tonnage, and was based on views directly contrary to the recommendations of the Committee of the House before which the subject was fully discussed. The Committee were strongly of opinion that it was undesirable to interfere with the shelters which were placed on the decks of ships to protect passengers as well as cattle and the cargo, and that it would be well they should be made more substantial and permanent. Now, he objected to the clause as an attempt to carry out by a sidewind a view opposed to that which that Committee had so decidedly expressed, and because it would have a retrospective action in defeating the decisions which had been already pronounced by two Scotch Courts, as well as by the House of Lords, on appeal as to the proper mode of measuring ships. It would, he thought, be a gross injustice on a shipowner who had expended thousands of pounds in making certain useful erections on board his ships, that he should be brought under the action of a clause which did not appear in the Bill on the second reading, and he hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would either withdraw or modify it very materially. As to the question of tonnage, he had no hesitation in saying that if the clause were to pass in its present shape, the whole Continental trade of the country would be carried on under foreign flags, because of the large quantity of fruit and other things which would require to be protected by deck-houses, which, if they were to be included in the tonnage measurement, would add 60 or 70 per cent to the tonnage of some vessels, so that it would be impossible for the British shipowner to compete with the foreigner. There was a time when the American Mercantile Marine was our greatest rival; but their marine had been so hampered and harassed by restrictions and regulations, that it had almost vanished from the seas: while the British, on the contrary, comparatively free, had continually and greatly increased. He might be told it was impossible for Government to interfere with foreign ships; but he could not adopt that view. Foreign countries interfered with the freedom of British shipping, and we interfered in the case of foreign ships carrying steerage passengers. He contended that the protection secured to passengers should be given to British seamen in foreign ships. In other countries a good deal more than this was done. In the United States and Canada—especially in New York and Montreal—very strict supervision was exercised in the loading of ships and everything connected with their seaworthiness. They were not allowed to sail if they were overloaded. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman during the progress of this measure would do something to guard against the possibility of British shipowners being placed at such a disadvantage as compared with the foreigner as would tempt them to put their ships under a foreign flag.

MR. GOURLEY, in seconding the Amendment, said, the proposal contained in the Resolution of the hon. Member for Tynemouth was not the re-introduction of Protection, or to give to British shipowners a superiority over foreigners, but by extending the provisions of the Bill, which now applied to British shipping only, to foreigners, in order thereby to place both on an equality, and so give an additional guarantee to free trade. The leading Governments of Europe virtually provided their merchant shipping with a supply of seamen by making sea service compulsory. They were compelled compulsorily to serve the State up to a certain age, and if they deserted from their ships in foreign ports they became outlaws, the consequence being that a German or a Frenchman scarcely ever deserted from his ship. The British Government not only did not assist the British shipowner in that respect; but in time of war they allowed his seamen to be pressed, and in time of peace to serve on board of Her Majesty's ships when required to fill up the requisite number of hands. Another ground of disadvantage was that British ships trading to foreign countries were made amenable both to the municipal and Imperial laws of those countries. In Russia, English seamen in the midst of winter were deprived of the use of fire after a certain hour if within a given distance of the quays, and they were compelled to send their food ashore to be cooked. A third ground on which British shipping was at a disadvantage was that the coasting trade of nearly all foreign countries was confined to vessels sailing under their own flag. The only way by which England could keep her position was to cause foreign and English shipping to be treated alike. It had been said that the maritime tonnage of foreign countries was so small that it was not worth being taken into account. Now, the real tonnage of British ships belonging to the United Kingdom, not taking into account the tonnage of colonial ships, was only 5,500,000 tons, and the tonnage of all European countries was no less than 7,000,000. We had from 180,000 to 200,000 seamen. Half a century ago Germany had scarcely any ships, but now she had over 1,000,000 tons, and from 40,000 to 50,000 seamen. France had now over 1,000,000 tons of shipping, with 50,000 seamen. Italy had over 1,000,000, Turkey 1,000,000, and Sweden and Norway together over 1,000,000. So that this country had to contend with over 7,000,000 tons of shipping, and it was now proposed to place British shipping at a further disadvantage by imposing regulations that would not apply to foreign shipping. The ostensible object of the Bill was to obtain infallibility in point of sea-worthiness, but that would be impossible as long as there were winds and waves. With regard to seaworthiness, he believed the existing laws would be sufficient if properly carried out; and he held that what the Government should have done was to bring in a Bill to codify and simplify those laws. As the law now stood, it was impossible for anyone to understand it. Of the 474 ships detained under the existing Act of 1873 all were not detained because they were really unseaworthy. 32 were detained because they were alleged to be overloaded; but in several cases where the shipowner had the courage to resist the Board of Trade the surveyors of that Board turned out to be wrong; and nearly the whole of the remainder of the ships were detained in consequence of what was called technical deficiencies. For example, in reference to lights, the surveyors in different ports disagreed. Such regulations should be laid down by the Bill as should make such disagreements impossible. As to the load-line, there ought to be two load-lines, one for salt and the other for fresh water; and every ship should be certified before she was permitted to proceed to sea. With regard to advance notes, he believed them to be necessary—he thought it impossible to abolish them; but if they were forbidden, the “crimps” would charge sailors extortionate prices for cashing allotment notes, which would become more extensively used if advance notes were abolished. He wished to know why, if the right hon. Gentleman wished to deal thoroughly with this question, he had not taken measures to bring about an international Consular Convention.

In the port of New York alone as many as 20,000 seamen annually deserted from the British merchant sea service, and took engagements in the ships of other nations, where they received better pay, and neither the captains nor the British Consul had power to arrest them and send them back to their own ships. In consequence of this, shipowners were put to an immense loss, while the sailors were not in the least benefited, as they were beset by a number of crimps who fleeced them of their money. Again, if a seaman broke a contract, even when owing to causes which were beyond his own control, and was brought before a magistrate for it, the magistrate had no alternative but must send him to prison. He thought that law ought to have been repealed before the introduction of a Bill of pains and penalties like that which they were now discussing. The Government ought, when introducing a Bill amending the law relating to British shipping, to have repealed the law under which seamen were liable to be criminally punished for breaking a purely civil contract. The only offences which ought to be regarded as criminal were theft, a bad look-out, and the endangering of the safety of property. The clause which he had stated would have the effect of finding a shipowner a millionaire one day and a beggar the next had been removed, but the clause which had been substituted for it was very little better, and would bring about the ruin of the trade by making the shipowner responsible for matters over which he had no control.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, no measure affecting Merchant Shipping can be deemed satisfactory which does not as far as practicable guard against ships sailing under foreign flags being at an advantage as compared with those under the British flag,"—(Mr. Eustace Smith.)

—instead thereof.

MR. GORST believed the Bill afforded a favourable opportunity for settling an important question. If it was not perfect in every particular, it was at least correct in its principle. The question was one in which a large class of the people of the country took a strong interest, and it was no longer confined to the Board of Trade on the one hand and the shipowners on the other. There were some matters of detail which he thought could be amended in Committee; but there were others in which he could not at all agree. One of these last was the proposal to abolish advance notes. Much misapprehension prevailed on that subject. An advance note, instead of being a bill of exchange or promissory note, was simply an ordinary contract between the master or owner of the ship and the seaman, that the former would, after the latter had sailed in the ship, pay to his order a certain sum of money. It was a promise which only the seaman himself could sue upon, but a promise in respect of which, if the shipowner fulfilled it, he had a right to deduct the amount so paid from the seaman's wages when they became due. The advance notes, however, passed from hand to hand among the shipping community, almost as if they were bank notes. It seemed to him a most extraordinary thing that the Board of Trade, which had so long resisted the attempt by legislation to make ships seaworthy, should be so ready to attempt to do the far more difficult thing of making sailors provident. The system might be open to abuse, but he agreed with the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. T. E. Smith), that the greatest obstacle would, by this part of the Bill, be thrown in the way of the honest and steady seaman making provision for his wife and family whom he left behind him. It was no doubt a bad practice for anybody to take an advance on his wages, but the thing was done in principle by hon. Members of that House when they took advances in one form or another upon their incomes. Why then, he asked, should they subject the seaman against his will to this paternal legislation and try to correct his idiosyncrasies by Act of Parliament? He, for one, could not understand the reason. Another difficulty was that if they put a stop to the advance-note system it would lead to the introduction of the truck system in its worst form, because, as many seamen shipped themselves when they were quite destitute of clothes, it would be necessary to enact that the master or owner might supply him with the necessaries for the voyage, and so command a monopoly for supplying an outfit with which he would otherwise supply himself by the money obtained on his advance note. As to the load-line, he thought it was a defect in the Bill that it did not define what was called "the ship's ordinary load water line;" and yet the shipowner was required by one of the clauses to paint certain lines on the side of the ship, which were to be at a particular distance from the imaginary ordinary load water line. The load-line ought not to be left to imagination, but ought to be actually painted on the ship's side. With regard to the proposed alteration in the law relating to measurement of tonnage, modifications might be found necessary in Committee, but he could not see what objection could be made to the principle of that particular part of the measure. By a recent decision of the House of Lords it was held that the space under the awning deck was not to be included in the measurement for tonnage on the ground that such a deck was not watertight. Now, he (Mr. Gorst) objected to any change of the law which would encourage shipowners to build their ships with unseaworthy decks. As to the compulsory survey of unclassified ships, shipowners and the Board of Trade held it would be impossible to carry out that survey. For his part, he was unable to see the impossibility of it. The larger proportion of ships being classed in Lloyd's, or some other register, those remaining were only some 3,000 or 4,000, and if a compulsory survey were carried out some of those vessels would be driven into some class or other, while others would probably be broken up; so that the residuum would be a very manageable number for the Government to survey. He would suggest that ships should be surveyed before, and not after, they were loaded and ready for sea, with a view of saving unnecessary expense to the shipowner. Vessels employed in the transport and Indian service were subjected to a most rigorous survey. He thought there was no ground for fear that the restrictions imposed by the Bill would interfere with the trade of the country; while as regarded the seamen its effect would be of the best possible character. Our seamen had never shrunk from peril at sea, and it was most unfair to make reflections upon them because they objected to go to sea in these vessels, which had been called

"traps" and "coffins;" and when all cause of fear in that respect was remedied a better class of men would enter the merchant service.

MR. D. JENKINS said, he thought the kind of unseaworthiness in question was very limited in extent, and that it might be remedied by legislation without infringing on the rights of any shipowner who endeavoured to send his ships to sea in a seaworthy condition. With reference to the penal clauses of the Bill he would remind the House that besides the causes of disasters owing to the unseaworthiness of crews, many losses could be clearly traced to the reckless and slovenly manner in which many of our merchant ships were navigated by their officers. He thought our shipowners were much to blame for their neglect in encouraging and fostering voluntary apprenticeship—had they done that there would have been no want of skilled seamen. The result of suspending an officer's certificate often was that he passed the period of his suspension in idleness, and returned much more unfitted to command a ship than he was when the accident occurred. Therefore, in the more flagrant cases it would be desirable to disqualify an officer altogether, while in other cases an officer ought to be compelled to serve a further apprenticeship and to pass a re-examination before being again entrusted with a command. He did not object to the employment of foreign seamen, many of whom would be naturalized and be useful in time of war. He hoped, too, our Government would give encouragement to training ships at our various outports—seamen could not be made like soldiers by a few months service—it took many years to make a sailor. The Acts on this subject were passed as tentative measures at a time of panic, and were never intended to remain permanently on the Statute Book. The greater number of the shipowners were men desirous of carrying on their business honestly, and they were opposed to overloading—he denied that as a class they were reckless of the lives of their seamen. The Bill would be, however, unsatisfactory unless it provided, first, for the periodical survey of unclassified ships, and, next, a more efficient remedy for the growing evil of overloading. With regard to unclassified ships there were first of all the vessels of a few great companies and firms, whose affairs were conducted in a manner which must be satisfactory even to the hon. Member for Derby. Nothing could be more perfect than their crews and equipment; and as they usually carried passengers their ships came under the officers of the Board of Trade, whose survey was more stringent than that of Lloyd's. The next type of unclassified ships was those owned by small private shipowners. They carried cargoes of small value, and as they were kept up to a fair standard of efficiency the owners would not suffer from a periodical survey. The unclassified tonnage which really required periodical survey was that described in the Appendices to the final Report of the Unseaworthy Ships Commission—ships that had seen their best days, but which could be kept in a seaworthy state for many years if they underwent a periodical and careful survey. Not one shipowner or captain in 20 was competent to survey these ships for seaworthiness. It might, indeed, be said of a large proportion of this unclassified tonnage that neither the owners, the captains, nor the crews knew whether the ships were seaworthy or not, and the first intimation they had of their unseaworthiness was by their springing a leak at sea. This unseaworthiness could, however, have been readily discovered by a competent surveyor in time to prevent disaster. Among the casualties which caused the loss of ships, cases of stranding figured very largely. No doubt the best ships were sometimes stranded; but this casualty was more likely to happen to badly found and ill-manned ships. A large proportion of the vessels reported as lost, foundered, or abandoned at sea were either not classed, or classed in some Foreign Association, of which no trustworthy information could be obtained. A number of casualties could be traced to defective spars, canvas, and rigging, especially in the coasting trade. It was said that if the ships at present unclassified were obliged to submit to a periodical survey the responsibility of the shipowners would be to some extent removed. This might be true, but only in the same sense that the responsibility of a shipowner whose vessel was classed A1 at Lloyd's was removed. The President of the Board of Trade thought that an army of surveyors would be required to survey these unclassified ships; but he (Mr. Jenkins) saw no necessity for a Government survey for this class of vessels. What objection could there be to a survey by the Local Marine Board of each district, whose report should be forwarded to the Board of Trade? It might be said that if local surveyors were appointed they might be exposed to undue influence or collusion with the shipowners of the port. If so, there was the Act of 1871 to fall back upon. He believed, however, that these surveyors would do their work honestly and give satisfaction, and the Government would be relieved of its responsibility. He believed that if this compulsory survey clause were put into the Bill very few ships after a brief period would be left to be dealt with under the Act:—the rotten and useless ships would disappear, while those that stood the survey would be enhanced in value from 20 to 25 per cent—there would be much less loss of life and property, and the country would be better satisfied. It should be recollected that the survey required for these unclassified ships would not be such as was expected in the case of first-class ships at Lloyd's. They did not usually take perishable goods, but they would be surveyed to see if they were tight, stanch, and strong, and able to stand a sea voyage. With regard to overloading, some sensational stories had been told as to the depth or want of depth of freeboard. Having had some experience, both at sea and on shore, he confessed he could not understand those cases. No doubt there was dangerous overloading in some trades, and screw steamers were sometimes loaded as if they were canal boats, and many of these vessels, when they met with exceptionally bad weather at sea, must founder. What he would suggest was, that the maximum draught of water to which a ship might be loaded should be submitted to the Board of Trade; that it should not be changed under any circumstances, and that it should be entered on the ship register. The danger at present was that ships were sometimes loaded to a line that no owner would dare to submit to the Board of Trade, and thus many disasters occurred which would not happen had the load-line been on the ships register. There were other clauses of the Bill to which he took some exception, but to which he would not allude further on that occasion. He was anxious to see a measure passed which should be practical in its working, while at the same time it would prevent the unnecessary sacrifice of life and property so far as it was in the power of the Legislature to effect that object.

MR. MAC IVER thought the hon. Members for Tynemouth (Mr. T. E. Smith) and Sunderland (Mr. Gourley), were somewhat unreasonably afraid of foreign competition. It had fallen to him (Mr. MacIver) in past years to have had some experience of competition with foreign vessels in the passenger trade, and that experience had led him to the conclusion that there would be no difficulty in obtaining their compliance with reasonable regulations in regard to cargo as well as in regard to passengers. There was already, he said, sufficient precedent in the operation of the Passengers' Act, and at the present moment foreign vessels could not embark steerage passengers in British ports except under compliance with British regulations. That which was already done in regard to steerage passengers, he (Mr. MacIver) thought could equally be done in the case of foreign vessels competing with British vessels for ordinary trade. In expressing a hope that the Bill might be referred to a Select Committee, he said that a real necessity existed for much more complete revision of the laws relating to Merchant Shipping than anything which was contemplated by the present measure; and he thought that the number and importance of the Amendments placed upon the Notice Paper abundantly justified him in holding that opinion. On the second reading of the Bill, they were all agreed as regarded broad general principles; but it was now evident they were not equally agreed in regard to the means of giving practical effect to those principles. Thirty-four pages of Amendments, by 44 different people, having reference for the most part to technical details of shipping management, must, if gone into carefully as they deserved to be, occupy the attention of the House for a very considerable time. Such Amendments as sought to repeal existing laws, and suggested new clauses to take their place, were of very considerable importance, and there were many such; but there were others still more numerous, which, if considered in a Committee of the Whole House, could only result in prolonged discussion, and, perhaps, in the end, frustrate the great object which they all had at heart. The objection might be urged that reference of the Bill to a Select Committee was now unnecessary, inasmuch as there had already been an exhaustive inquiry into the subject by a Royal Commission. It was true that a Royal Commission, composed of very eminent men, having very extensive powers, did investigate the subject; but theirs was, he (Mr. MacIver) maintained, by no means an exhaustive inquiry, and they did not exercise their powers. Liverpool was second to no port in the world as regarded steam tonnage; not even second to London itself, yet only two Liverpool steamship owners were examined by the Royal Commissioners; and one of those witnesses was his (Mr. MacIver's) father. There was no steamship owner in the world whose experience was greater than his father's, or whose views in regard to the essential conditions of safe navigation were entitled to more respect. Quoting his father's evidence from the official digest of the proceedings of the Royal Commissioners, he (Mr. MacIver) pointed out that nothing could be more emphatically at variance with the views which his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), and those who were working with him, persistently urged with so much ability. His (Mr. MacIver's) father told the Royal Commissioners in the plainest terms that overloading of steamers was of frequent occurrence, and could only be prevented by legislative interference; and in equally plain terms he told the Commissioners that such interference ought, in his judgment, to take the form of Government survey, coupled with the general adoption of a compulsory load-line. His (Mr. MacIver's) father told the Commissioners that there was no practical difficulty whatever in either branch of the subject, and that "he could not see that insisting on proper strength should hamper enterprise or improvement." These were his father's words to the Royal Commissioners, and he (Mr. MacIver) entirely agreed with him. Could anything be more entirely in harmony with the views of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) in regard to the direction in which alone legislation could be made effectual for the prevention of those disasters which they all deplored? He

(Mr. MacIver) maintained, therefore, that a real necessity existed for immediate legislation as regarded this branch of the subject, and that the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had done good service in keeping the question before the country. He (Mr. MacIver) desired again to impress upon the House that, unless in the rarest instances, it was an entire mistake to suppose that vessels were purposely lost. Take, for example, the steamers which had foundered during the past winter. The owners of these vessels, as he (Mr. MacIver) believed, never intended any of them to be lost. The ordinary law of the land would be able to reach them if they did. What was really required was a proper system of periodical survey in regard to vessels not bad enough to be stopped under the Act of 1873. Until there was such a survey, the owners of second-rate property would always remain only too ready to believe their vessels to be in better condition than they were: and similarly in regard to load-line. It was not necessary to assume intention to overload. On the contrary, he believed such intention rarely or never existed; but he maintained that those who were pecuniarily interested in a venture were not always the persons best qualified to judge. They might wish to form unbiassed opinions; but it did not follow that they could do so. Nor would the opinions of some shipowners in regard to depth of loading or other conditions of seaworthiness be practically worth much even if they could. The Board of Trade already attempted too much surveying, but there was no reason why such work should not to some extent more than at present be entrusted to the registry societies. If a Select Committee were now appointed it would have the advantage of being able to consider not merely the Report of the Royal Commissioners, and the evidence upon which such Report was based; but it would have the further advantage of being able to consider the still more valuable evidence furnished by the Amendments which had been placed upon the Notice Paper. It might be taken that the views held at every seaport in the Kingdom had been carefully expressed with something like legal precision in those Amendments. He (Mr. MacIver) believed that if the whole subject were now referred to a

Mr. MacIver

Select Committee the remedies proposed by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) would easily be reconciled by such Committee with the principle of the Government Bill. There was, he said, considerable misconception on the subject, even amongst hon. Members who had taken a prominent part in these discussions. Referring to the arguments made use of by his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), upon the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, he (Mr. MacIver) pointed out that such argument was based on premisses which were entirely mistaken. The Cunard Company had been successful not under the conditions described by his hon. Friend (Mr. Rathbone), but precisely under the conditions which his hon. Friend said would have made success impossible. In earlier days the Cunard steamers were to all practical intents and purposes paddle-wheel frigates, and, until recent years, their postal service had been conducted under a supervision from the Admiralty far more stringent than anything which even the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had ever dreamt of. He (Mr. MacIver) was not one of those who "call out loudly" as suggested by his hon. Friend (Mr. Rathbone) for Government direction and control; but he did earnestly believe that in some respects the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners were utterly mistaken. The principles of survey and of responsibility were in his (Mr. MacIver's) view perfectly reconcilable. They inspected passenger steamers, railways, mines, and factories, and in all cases with good results; and it was clear therefore that the proposals of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) could not successfully be resisted by such reasoning as that of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) and those who were working with him. He was very glad to be able to pass on to a matter in which he could very heartily and cordially agree with his good Friend the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone). His hon. Friend presented sometime ago two Petitions from the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, which had been published and widely circulated, and which he (Mr. MacIver) thought were of considerable importance, and entitled to very great respect. It was true that they had been adopted at a very small meeting attended principally by representatives of limited liability companies; but the Petitions, nevertheless, might be taken as fairly representing views which were largely held. Shipowners had nothing to gain by a Government supervision of their ships; very few shipowners desired it; and, as it would be more or less troublesome to them, they would rather be without it; but he thought it was necessary. He (Mr. MacIver) was no believer in the idea of preventing disasters by intensifying the responsibility of shipowners; but, at the same time, he did not desire to oppose such legislation if it could be made a reality. He thought, however, that personal responsibilities were at present somewhat undefined; but, having regard to the prayer of the Petitions from the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association he had placed Amendments upon the Notice Paper providing that, in the case of limited liability companies, two at least of the directors should be compelled to place themselves within the position of responsibility asked for by the Association. Responsibility, he said, should be fairly and equally applied, but having done all that was possible to be done in that direction, it would still be necessary to fall back upon the principle of survey combined with that of load-line. The necessity of legislation in regard to load-line which the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had urged so long, having now been admitted, in some form or other, not merely by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, but by almost every shipowner in the House of Commons, it was idle to fight against such legislation. But he (Mr. MacIver) did most earnestly urge that the principles of load-line and of survey ought to be considered together. He desired to point out that depth of loading was only one of several conditions on which seaworthiness depended. He considered that inferior vessels of insufficient strength contained less weight of material in themselves than heavier vessels of better construction. It was therefore, in his view, absolutely necessary—if legislating in regard to load-line—to legislate also in regard to the inspection of vessels not already sufficiently surveyed by registry societies. Seaworthiness was not a mere question of freeboard. He (Mr. MacIver) had only recently returned from ship-building ports where he had seen models of vessels ordered with a view to legislation based on the principle of load-line. If such legislation were adopted it would lead to the construction of vessels built—not merely of insufficient material—but with higher sides than they ought to have with a view to comply with such conditions. He ventured to impress upon the House that, however desirable it was to legislate with respect to load-line, as he believed it was, it was an entire mistake to suppose that the seaworthiness of vessels depended entirely on the question of load-line. Load-line ought not to be lost sight of; but it should only be considered in connection with the quality of the ship, with her general arrangements, and with the sufficiency of the material of which she was constructed. He concluded by saying that he had no desire to press his Motion for a Select Committee. Those who had greater Parliamentary experience than he would be better able to judge whether the present measure could be brought into a satisfactory form without such reference; but, if a Select Committee were appointed, he (Mr. MacIver) earnestly hoped they would report speedily in regard to the questions of load-line and survey, in order that legislation might take place this Session. And he thought that the consideration of the other questions might stand over until next year.

MR. PALMER thought the Bill introduced by the Government sufficiently comprehensive to enable the House to make a very useful measure of it, and he could bear testimony that the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the measure had devoted much time and consideration to it, and had undertaken some arduous journeys in order to ascertain the opinion of the most experienced persons in our large shipping ports on the subject with which it dealt; and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not be deterred from attempting to carry it through Committee by the very large number of Notices of Amendments which had been placed on the Paper. The subject, in its leading aspects, had already been discussed at such length that he did not intend to detain the House. He was glad that a serious effort was to be made to improve the existing law—for it must be remembered that the legislation of 1873 had been undertaken at a time when the public mind had been much excited by the hon. Member for Derby and others, and since that time an agitation had been kept up which had caused great anxiety to the shipping interest as to the future. The shipping of Great Britain, it ought not to be forgotten, had in modern times undergone a very great and important change. The old sailing ship, which carried few hands and comparatively little cargo, had given way to the great steamers, which carried many persons, crew, and passengers, and much cargo; and any accident to one of those steamers caused a sensational feeling to spread all the country over, and caused a loud outcry for immediate legislation. It was beyond doubt the duty of the House and the country to do all in their power to reduce, as far as possible, the number of those accidents. Accidents to steamships were not in proportion to their number more numerous than to sailing vessels; but, however that might be, what the shipowners desired was to see the law so amended that they might distinctly know the conditions they were required to fulfil in carrying on their business. He knew that as a body they were as desirous as the hon. Member for Derby, or anybody else, to reduce the number of accidents and the loss of life and property at sea. There were some details which would require careful consideration. For instance, was the proposed load-line to be applied to the coasting trade as well as to the general trade? If it was, the whole of the coasting trade in the North of England would be put under very serious embarrassment—indeed, it would be almost impossible under such new conditions to carry it on. He was glad, however, that the Board of Trade had decided to have a load-line of some character, as he believed that a load-line could be fixed for all ships under all circumstances. At the same time, he entirely approved of a general survey by an independent and efficient staff of surveyors on the Board of Trade without the assistance of any other institution. Each ship should be separately surveyed in order to fix the load-line, and that once done it need not be altered for many years, unless some great change took place in the vessel itself. He did not wish to make any distinction in these cases between summer and winter. If a ship could not be navigated under all circumstances, she should not be navigated at all. He knew there was some excitement in the House on the subject of advance notes, but he hoped the President of the Board of Trade would persevere and not withdraw this clause—it was the only way of keeping the seamen out of the hands of crimps; and it enabled the men to make arrangements by which their wives and families were maintained while they were on a voyage. He believed when the advance note system was done away with it would find its own cure—seamen would rely upon their character instead of being carried away by the wretched persons who lived upon them. In giving up advance notes, however, he must express a decided objection to reverting to the truck system, the revival of which would be a great evil. As to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Reed) with reference to the testing of iron, he believed if that passed it would deal a most serious blow to shipbuilding, for it would make it impossible for the English iron shipbuilder to compete with foreigners. He hoped the measurement clause would be expunged, for he thought if the question of measurement was to be undertaken it ought to be undertaken in connection with foreign Governments, and the Bill dealing with it ought to be a separate piece of legislation. They could never reach a high scale of perfection until they had better seamen, and he thought more ought to be done through training-ships to supply the merchant service with properly-educated and well-conducted seamen.

SIR JOHN HAY, who had given Notice of a Motion—namely—

"That no legislation on this subject can be considered satisfactory which does not propose to amend Schedule (C) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, 'The Rule of the Road at Sea,'" said, that most of the subjects referred to in the discussion were very fit to be dealt with in Committee, and therefore he would not refer to them; but there was one cause of loss of life at sea—and a very fertile cause—which had been alluded to by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) to which he particularly desired to draw the attention of the House—he meant collisions. Not only was loss of life from that cause much greater than it ought to be, but it was continuously increasing. He held in his hand a communication made to him by a well-known officer of Lloyd's, from which it appeared that while in 1866 the loss of life from collisions was 1,958, it was 2,843 in 1873—the last year for which we had a Return. The increase of collisions had been gradual, and he was assured—though on that point he had not verified his information—that it was larger than the increase in our merchant shipping. Therefore the present regulations for the prevention of collisions had not had the good effect which they ought to have had. The number of collisions in 1866 was, as he had stated, 1,958; in 1870 it was 2,290; in 1871, 2,561; in 1872, 2,627; and in 1873, 2,843. He thought this evidently proved that some change was necessary in the "Rule of the Road at Sea." The Board of Trade, or, rather, the Foreign Office, had had their attention called to the lamentable loss of life at sea by no less than three of the foreign Governments of Europe. He held in his hand a Return, dated August, 1874, which was a copy of a report on steering and sailing rules—"the Rule of the Road at Sea." In this correspondence, which had been laid on the Table by his right hon. Friend, there were communications from the Government of the Netherlands, the Government of France, and also from Denmark, calling attention to the unsatisfactory condition of what was known as the "Rule of the Road at Sea;" and praying that such changes should be made as seemed to be necessary. Among the Notices of Amendment on this Bill, he had ventured, at the desire of the Board of Trade, to place his opinion as to an amended Rule of the Road at Sea in a consolidated form; but the Amendments were not so considerable as they looked on the Notice Paper. In the Return which had been placed on the Table would be found a communication from the French Government containing an account of the deliberations of the French Legislative Assembly which our Representative at Paris had thought sufficiently important to communicate to the Foreign Office. It appeared that a most important Committee had been appointed by the French Legislative Assembly upon this subject, a considerable number of changes were recommended, and it was thought necessary that immediate action should be taken.

The Board of Trade had always rightly said that what was called "the Rule of the Road at Sea" had been adopted by 33 Governments, and it was most difficult to make changes without the consent of all those Governments. Until this year there was no information before the House that the Board of Trade had been called on by foreign Governments to make the changes which persons who had considered the subject thought desirable. But they were now called on by the French Government as soon as might be to consider the changes which were necessary in "the Rule of the Road at Sea." If the subject was of such importance in the eyes of foreign Governments, he might be excused if he again urged on our own Government the necessity of amending that rule for the safety of life and property. The Paper to which he referred gave in three columns the existing regulations, the Board of Trade suggestions, and the French suggestions. He could not say that the French suggestions were totidem verbis the same he had placed on the Notice Paper; but the particular clauses in which the French Government suggested changes were those which he also desired to modify. He had ventured on a former occasion to suggest that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade should appoint a Royal Commission to take into consideration not only the proposals he ventured to make, but other suggestions, and to communicate with the Governments of France, the Netherlands, and Denmark on the subject; and he hoped that his right hon. Friend, if not able to appoint a Commission, would nominate a Committee to investigate and report what changes were necessary, so that Schedule C should be amended to give more confidence both to foreign Powers and ourselves. He hoped his right hon. Friend would be able to assure the House that steps had been taken which would be satisfactory, not only to this country, but to foreign countries, to save our shipping from the scandal arising from the loss of life and property which to a large extent was attributable to errors connected with the present "Rule of the Road at Sea."

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he had no desire to delay the House getting into Committee on this Bill; but, referring particularly to Clause 9, having reference to the issue of advance notes, he must appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether it was worth while to annoy the shipping interest by insisting on it? Why, in the name of common sense, of charity, of justice, pass such a law as this? It was arbitrary and tyrannical. Why should not shipowners and sailors be allowed to make contracts like anybody else? The shipping trade of this country was very important, and it ought not to be supposed that those who were engaged in it were all children or knaves, and that that House only knew everything about it. He knew that there was bad conduct on the part of some sailors; but it was a principle of law, as of charity, to let ten bad men escape rather than run the risk of punishing one innocent one. As to the effect of the present measure upon the carrying trade—he might state that our timber-carrying trade had entirely gone into the hands of foreigners, and, unless we were careful with our legislation, other branches of our trade would be lost also. It was not by placing our shipping interest in leading-strings that we could hope to maintain our position as a great maritime nation. Was it a proper thing for a free country like this that the Government should take the whole management of our Mercantile Marine entirely under their charge, and that shipowners should not be able to do a single thing without an officer of the Board coming down to the docks to examine and tell them what they were to do? He knew the Government was a good deal forced into action of that kind by the cry on the part of the public for legislation; but he hoped the House would not insist on the Government undertaking the management of everything and telling everybody what they were to do in the way of business. If they did, then the responsibility would be thrown on the Government, and they might also bid good-by to our great trade and to our supremacy at sea.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he fully sympathized with the desire of the last speaker that the Government should interfere as little as possible with the Mercantile Marine of this country, and also with his wish that they might speedily go into Committee. But the House was now asked, instead of going into Committee, to pass an abstract Resolution declaring that they should guard as far as possible against ships sailing under foreign flags being put at an advantage as compared with British ships. If there was any pleasure in passing abstract Resolutions, they might pass one more abstract still, omitting the reference to shipping, and saying that they should guard against foreigners under any circumstances being placed at an advantage over Englishmen. But such vague and general declarations were useless and unmeaning. The debate on the second reading was characterized by everybody as "a Committee debate," every speech having been directed, not to the principle of the Bill—on which the House was generally agreed—but to the applicability of each clause to the carrying out of that principle in detail. He now appealed to the common sense of the House whether the same thing might not be said of the lengthy speeches which they had heard that night, and whether there was any practical advantage in prolonging that discussion out of Committee. The hon. Member who moved the Resolution (Mr. T. E. Smith) said he was disappointed with the Bill, because he thought it would have saved the shipowners from more interference by the Board of Trade; but he (Sir Charles Adderley) could show that the clauses of the measure would have that effect, and would introduce a self-acting system which would relieve the Government of their most unwelcome, dangerous, and difficult task of interference. For instance, it was said that the Government surveyors should not arbitrarily stop ships which they considered to be improperly loaded: what the Government wished and what the Bill proposed was that the shipowners themselves should state their load line for every voyage, record it, and not load beyond it. Then the hon. Member said they most unnecessarily interfered with the transference of British ships to foreign flags. That was not the case;—they only proposed to interfere with fraudulent transfers made with a view to evade liability. The discussion had turned much on the 9th clause, which he hoped would be debated that night in Committee. He agreed in the description given by the Mover of the Resolution of the advance note, which it was proposed to prohibit, and which he denounced in the same strong terms, or stronger, as the Royal Commissioners, on whose Report the Bill was mainly founded. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. MacIver) suggested that they should not abolish the advance note in England, but call upon foreign Powers by a Convention to put an end to it abroad. But surely they ought not to ask others to do what they would not begin by doing themselves, and setting an example. He would not reply to all the speeches that had been delivered by hon. Members, but he must demur to the proposal of the hon. Member for Birkenhead, who asked them to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and thus commence a prolonged inquiry de novo. Now, he (the hon. Member) had not long been a Member of that House, and perhaps had not had time to study two folio Blue Books containing the Report of the Royal Commission, or he would have known that there was hardly any subject which had been so thoroughly sifted as that now before the House. It had been investigated by most able men, presided over by the Duke of Somerset, whose impartiality and judicial tone of mind pre-eminently qualified him for the inquiry. The Commission drew evidence from all parts of the Kingdom and from all classes of men acquainted with the subject. The hon. Gentleman said Liverpool was not duly represented among the witnesses; but if he looked through the list of those examined he would find that that most important port made its full contribution to the body of evidence taken. The right hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) had brought forward another important subject—namely, “the Rule of the Road at Sea”—which, though connected with the subject of merchant shipping generally, was scarcely relevant to the Bill itself. It was enough to say, with regard to this matter, that it was at present before a well-constituted Departmental Committee. He would hardly be justified in anticipating the report of that Committee by expressing any decided opinion of his own upon the subject. The Rules of the Road at Sea ought not to be hastily changed. Even bad rules which were universally known were better than good rules which were not generally known. Changes must be made in concert with other nations. The existing rules had been framed under the Act of 1862 in concert with France, and had since been adopted by all the other maritime nations in the world. Under that Act Her Majesty had power to alter the rules, but it had not been thought fit to make any change in them. After the Departmental Committee had reported, and foreign Governments had been consulted, the Board of Trade would put itself in communication with the Admiralty, and under the powers of the Act of 1862, any amended rules would be brought into force. He hoped, under these circumstances, that there would be no further discussion on this subject, and that the House would now go into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. BENTINCK said, his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) seemed to have discovered that discussion of this subject was extremely inconvenient, but he (Mr. Bentinck) was unable to assent to the wish of his right hon. Friend, and he trusted that before the House went into Committee on the Bill every hon. Member who felt interest in the matter would express his opinions upon it. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that the question had been thoroughly sifted. Now he would tell the right hon. Gentleman that, however much it had, in his opinion, been sifted, they had very little grain and a great deal of chaff. As to the proposition of the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. T. E. Smith), he declared that the first serious blow which had been struck at the Mercantile Marine of this country had been the repeal of the Navigation Laws, and that until a large part of these laws had been re-enacted, the Mercantile Marine would not be placed upon a proper footing. The right hon. Gentleman had passed over all the most important parts of this great question. The great fault of the Bill was in the omission in not dealing with those important parts of the question with which it was expected to deal. As regarded the question raised by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Stamford with respect to the Rule of the Road at Sea, there had been so much blundering in determining it, and so much loss of life had ensued in consequence, that the sailors spoke of it as “Going to—the infernal regions—by Act of Parliament.” What he most objected to, however, was the modification of the discipline clauses. Even now they were not sufficiently stringent. If a man broke into the spirit-room with a light in search of spirits and fired the vessel, he escaped without any punishment at all. Again, as another instance of the present discipline laws not being sufficiently stringent, the man who kept a bad look-out, and thereby endangered the safety of the ship and crew, could be only punished by a month's imprisonment, which was no punishment at all; and unless the House was prepared to require much more stringent discipline on board our merchant ships than we now had, they would entirely fail in the main object they had in view—that of preventing the loss of life and property at sea. He would, however, support the Motion for going into Committee, and have all those matters dealt with there.

Mr. MACGREGOR said, he was as anxious as anyone to go into Committee on the Bill, but it was only right to call the attention of the House and of the President of the Board of Trade to the fact that after a lengthened disappearance this Bill had re-appeared almost as a new Bill, and really contained provisions which they had not previously heard of. He especially complained of the 37th clause relating to measurement. The Preamble of the Bill declared that there were doubts existing as to the law of the land in various matters, and it contained a series of gross misstatements. In whose mind, he asked, had these doubts arisen? There was certainly no doubt as to the law of the land, for on the 15th March, 1854, the House of Lords came to a decision as to the legal responsibility of owners in reference to the measurement of their ships. A Special Committee of the House had also arrived at a decision upon the point, which was totally adverse to the proposition brought forward in this Bill. He should be very glad if the Government would re-consider the clause dealing with this subject, and if possible withdraw it before going into Committee; first on account of the promise which they made to the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Palmer) not to legislate upon the point this year; and next, because after the decision of the House of Lords facts were misstated in the Preamble. He believed, taking all things into consideration, it would be better to send the Bill to a Special Committee, notwithstanding the sneers with which the President of the Board of Trade greeted the proposal of the hon. Member for Birkenhead, whose name, though he was one of the youngest Members of the House, was sufficient to guarantee that he must know something of shipping, and who 11 years ago had been chairman of a committee of shipowners in the largest port in the world. He believed by passing the clause they would be encouraging the construction of a very bad class of ships. He did not wish to occupy time, but simply to call attention to the propriety of the clause being removed from the Bill, because if a Measurement and Tonnage Bill were required it had better be referred to a Select Committee, which would be the course the House adopted last year. After the many weeks' labour and the careful attention which the Committee of last year paid to the subject, the course which had been adopted could not be regarded as a compliment to them, notwithstanding the fact that the President of the Board of Trade had from time to time spoken very highly of the services they had rendered. It was said at the time that the Bill as it had been amended would be adopted by every maritime nation in the world; and yet when it came down again to the House it was postponed for a year, on the ground that it would be well to study the Report of the Royal Commission, and they now saw the result. He thought the 37th clause should be expunged from the Bill—first, because it was a breach of promise; secondly, because it was totally opposed to the judgment and opinion of the House of Lords; thirdly, because there was no doubt existing in the minds of anyone as to the state of the law except the officials of the Board of Trade; lastly, he thought, in deference to the Report of the Select Committee, the clause should be left out, because the House, as they had lately seen, was always chary of reversing the judgments of the Committee.

Mr. PLIMSOLL said, the House would not be surprised to hear that he had a good deal to say on the subject under discussion. As, however, he could say what he had to say much better in Committee than he could then, and as he was anxious the House should proceed to consider the provisions of the Bill, he would await the opportunity to which he had referred.

Mr. Bentinck

Clause 6 postponed.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Clause 8 (Rule as to names of British sea-fishing boats).

MR. DALWAY moved, in page 3, line 17, to insert—

“A vessel employed in the coasting trade of less than eighty tons registered tonnage not registered as a British sea-fishing boat shall be exempt from the provisions of this Act, save and except as it refers to her lights and boats.”

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought it a monstrous proposition that those vessels should be exempted from all the provisions with respect to seaworthiness.

MR. NORWOOD counselled the withdrawal of the Amendment now, but said he should be quite prepared to give, at the proper time, excellent reasons why these small coasting vessels ought not to be placed in the same category as larger vessels.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Advance notes illegal).

MR. HAMOND moved the omission from the clause of all the words from line 20 to 29, both inclusive, contending that they would injuriously interfere with the law of contract in shipping matters by the abolition of advance notes, and tend to introduce the abominable system of truck.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that the clause was founded upon one of the strongest recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, who said in their Report that—

“Unless this mischievous mode of prepayment was abolished the sailor could never be raised from a state of servile dependence on crimps, and taught to rely on his own industry and intelligence.”

There was a general concurrence of opinion throughout the country in favour of abolishing advance notes, which enabled seamen to spend all their money and then to embark without any outfit at all: As to a seaman providing for his family, that he could do by means of allotment notes.

MR. MAC IVER admitted that advance notes tended to degrade the sailor, but he did not see how they could be altogether dispensed with.

MR. SAMUDA said, that many ship-owners thought that advance notes could not be altogether done away with, and the sailors were of the same opinion. Would it, under these circumstances, be wise to abolish them? To provide slops on board would create great evil in the case of small owners, who would force sailors to take many things which they did not really want. He hoped that the clause would be reconsidered.

MR. HENLEY was very glad that this Amendment had been proposed. He did not see why they should interfere between master and man in this matter. If the master would make the advance, and the man wanted it, what right was there to say that this should not be done? It would act cruelly on the side of the seaman. He naturally stayed with his wife and family till all the money was gone. He went to sea again when his pockets were empty, and then but for the advance note the wife would be left without a farthing, and the husband would be able to buy nothing for himself. It was said she would receive her monthly money; but until she could get her monthly note she must go on “tick;” and so on, month after month, until the end of the chapter. The owners who did not like to give advance notes might refuse to do so, but let those who liked to give them do so. He should heartily support the Amendment.

MR. A. PEEL felt great difficulty in the face of conflicting opinions in deciding upon this Amendment—the question really was, whether advance notes on the truck system was the worse of the two? This was the first time he had heard the system of advance notes defended as a means of support to the wife. He would venture to say that not a penny of the advance went to the man's wife and family or was spent otherwise than in riot and debauchery, and that the system weakened the character of the seamen and prevented the shipowner from getting good and trustworthy men. Twenty years ago Mr. Lindsay stated that advance notes tended to induce desertion. He should certainly vote for the proposition of the Government.

MR. RITCHIE thought that if advance notes were made legal—which they were not at present, for they could not be sued on till the end of the voyage—the seaman would be able to get full value for them, and would be comparatively secure from crimps. If the shipowner was willing to advance to the

The Committee divided: — Ayes 39; Noes 187: Majority 148.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL proposed, after the word "owners," to insert "if the sale be by owners," in order to meet the objection which had been raised by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood).

MR. MACGREGOR asked why the law should be altered at all? He had had a great deal of experience in shipping, and never found any flaw in the Act. The result of the alteration would be to land the law in utter confusion, and he thought the best way would be to expunge the clause altogether. He should like to know who had suggested such a clause as this to the right hon. Gentleman. Their object should be to legislate for seamen, and not for mortgagees.

LORD ESLINGTON said, it was the duty of the Minister in charge of the Bill to explain its nature; but in this case nine more clauses containing new matter had been introduced since the Bill was brought in, and such a proceeding was most unusual, and fraught with such immense inconvenience that he must protest against it. If the Bill were in danger it would be in consequence of the adoption of the course he had referred to, and therefore he thought the right hon. Baronet would do well to withdraw all these clauses.

MR. ALFRED MARTEN said, that this clause, in the case of a sale of a ship or the part of one, was to prevent the closing of the register without the consent of all the owners for the time being in the ship.

MR. GOURLEY said, it would be better if the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw the clause. The owners of 63-64ths of a ship could not bind the owner of the remaining 64th. The clause was quite unnecessary.

MR. MAC IVER opposed the clause.

MR. MACGREGOR said, the clause would lead to no end of trouble and leave everybody in confusion.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY reminded his noble Friend (Lord Eslington) that he had avowedly had the Bill committed pro forma with a view not only to add two new clauses to the Bill, but also such of the Amendments on the Paper as he could accept; his object being to render the Bill so comprehensive of all additions generally called for to existing statutes that further legislation on the subject would not be required for some years to come. There seemed to him to be a very great omission in the principal Act on the point under discussion, which required to be supplied; but in the present state of the discussion he proposed to postpone this and the 6th clause with the view of bringing up on the Report a redraft which would meet the objections that had been made.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, that Clause 5 be postponed?

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I protest against the disgraceful scene which is now going on. ["Order."]

THE CHAIRMAN: I have to point out to the hon. and gallant Member that the expression which he has just used is one never employed by Members in this House.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Then I withdraw it. But I say it is a most extraordinary circumstance to find a Minister of the Crown incapable of expressing himself. ["Order."] The right hon. Baronet has not attempted to reply to the strictures which have been passed on the clause, but he turns round to the Attorney General and asks him for his advice. Such a state of things was never known before. The oldest Member in this House cannot remember anything of the sort. The right hon. Baronet does not answer arguments; he relies on his majority, and I want to know whether that is a proper course to pursue? I think the Prime Minister ought to have officers under him who can reply to strictures.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have to point out to the hon. and gallant Member that the question before the Committee is whether Clause 5 should be postponed.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Well, I will go on. It now appears that the right hon. Gentleman withdraws his clause altogether. We do not know what we are doing at all. I ask whether this House has been treated properly on this important subject by the Ministers of the Crown to-night? I say they have not.

Question agreed to; Clause postponed.

Clause 6 postponed.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Clause 8 (Rule as to names of British sea-fishing boats).

He would venture to say that not a penny of the advance went to the man's wife and family or was spent otherwise than in riot and debauchery, and that the system weakened the character of the seamen and prevented the shipowner from getting good and trustworthy men. Twenty years ago Mr. Lindsay stated that advance notes tended to induce desertion. He should certainly vote for the proposition of the Government.

MR. RITCHIE thought that if advance notes were made legal—which they were not at present, for they could not be sued on till the end of the voyage—the seaman would be able to get full value for them, and would be comparatively secure from crimps. If the shipowner was willing to advance to the sailor what he required, there was no reason why he should not do so.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY unhesitatingly said, that the abolition of advance notes was the first and indispensable step to render the sailor respectable, and improve the morale of our Mercantile Marine. The evidence before the Royal Commission had shown that the system of advance notes was full of evil both to the seaman and the shipowner. No witness before the Commission had spoken in favour of the system.

MR. MACDONALD said, that the House had interfered between employer and employed in many Acts of Parliament, and had done so very beneficially. They had been told that one of the great causes of the demoralized condition of our seamen was their improvidence. Well, the Government had wisely taken a step in the right direction to put an end to that improvidence as far as they could, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentlemen would keep strongly to that point. He believed that most of the Petitions got up against this proposition were the concoction of the crimps.

LORD ESLINGTON said, that as one of the Royal Commissioners, he could assure the Committee that the Royal Commissioners went fully into the question, and formed their judgment after hearing all the evidence. If one branch of the subject was exhausted more than another it was the question of advance notes. There was an accumulation of evidence in favour of their abolition, and all the shipowners who were examined condemned the practice. Most of them agreed that great inconvenience would no doubt at first arise on their abolition, but none of them defended the system. If the system of advance notes was continued they ought to be made payable at a longer date than at present. He should certainly stand by the Report of the Commission, and vote for the clause. If the masters did not object to it and the seamen asked for it, both parties were agreed. The men, no doubt, had been so long accustomed to the system that its abolition would be felt at first as an inconvenience; but if it was found to be injurious it ought to be abolished.

MR. NORWOOD said, there was a great conflict of opinion on the question. He fully admitted that in many cases advance notes were abused, but, all things considered, he did not think the House would be justified in taking so forcible a step as abolishing them merely at the beck of the Government. If the custom were to be modified, it ought to be modified by degrees, and he had placed an Amendment on the Paper that an advance note should not be granted for more than a fortnight's wages.

MR. MACGREGOR observed that for the present he could not see how advance notes could be abolished.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that when in 1870 he prepared the Merchant Shipping Bill he made inquiries at almost every important port, and the evidence showed that the advance note was the parent of many evils; but, at the same time, it was a great convenience to the sailor. Not all sailors made a bad use of it. He thought it would be desirable to ease this question down by slow degrees, and to limit the advance note to one fortnight at home and one month abroad.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that almost all the speeches made had been in favour of the clause. ["No!"] The principal speeches certainly had been, and even those hon. Members who opposed it confessed that they did not see their way to its amendment. He admitted that some hon. Gentlemen had considered it impossible to do away with the advance note; but it seemed to him that the reasons given were altogether unsatisfactory. He thought the argument of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire was not characterized by his usual sagacity. When it was said that this clause was an interference with the freedom of contract, he wished to remind hon. Members that there was no such thing as abstract freedom of contract in a country governed by law. Parliament had legislated against the truck system, and the advance note itself was a species of truck system. The seaman had no legal right to his wages until the conclusion of his voyage, and the advance note was not recognized in any Act of Parliament, but was a vicious custom. The advance note was, in fact, a deduction from the sailor's means of providing by allotment notes for a wife and family, and was generally applied during the three days before going on board in drinking and debauchery. The result was the seamen too often went on board in a state in which they were quite unfit to perform their duties. It was, in fact, one of the chief causes for ships going in unseaworthy condition to sea. The advance note was recognized in the Act of 1850, but after four years' experience Parliament deliberately repealed all provisions relating to it; it could not now be sued upon. The custom had deteriorated the character of our seamen, and in short voyages it placed the master at the mercy of his crew, who by anticipation had got possession of their wages for the whole voyage. The clause was based upon the Report of the Royal Commission, the language of which was very strong; but, as many hon. Members wished the abolition of advance notes to be gradual, he should be prepared at the proper time to adopt the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) to insert in Clause 9, page 3, line 21, after "money," the words "exceeding 20s."

MR. BATES opposed the clause, because it would be cruel to the sailors and inconvenient to the shipowner, and because it would give a great advantage to foreign shipowners. It was a clause "meddling and muddling" with a trade which its framers evidently knew nothing about. Nothing but a sense of duty would have induced him to oppose the Government on this subject. The clause was opposed by all the largest sailing shipowners in all the principal ports. [The hon. Member here produced a file of letters from individual owners and firms, all protesting against the abolition of advance notes, and read a protest signed by 12 underwriters at Lloyd's, who expressed the belief that the discontinuance of advances would drive the best seamen into the hands of foreign shipowners.] He had received letters from unemployed officers and seamen declaring that advance notes were indispensable to their re-engagement, and recommending, instead of the abolition of notes, the licensing of lodging-house keepers. The Royal Commission, he said, knew nothing of the subject practically, and not one-half of them knew anything of the management or requirements of a ship.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the labours of the Royal Commission were before the House. Amongst the recommendations of the Commission was one as to the abolition of the advance notes, and his right hon. Friend had embodied in the Bill a clause to give effect to it. It was obvious that the question was one beset with enormous difficulties; but he thought it was a question with which they ought to grapple. The Government were, therefore, of opinion that it might be desirable to deal with it by way of compromise, and they thought the best course would be to divide on the principle of the abolition of advance notes that evening, and then to take the various suggestions made into consideration with a view to see which of them it would be advisable to adopt.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON thought this discussion was somewhat opposed to ordinary practice. The ordinary rule was for a Committee to endeavour to amend a clause, and then it had an opportunity of voting upon its retention or rejection; but here the Amendment of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond) would have the effect of rejecting the clause altogether. He thought the Committee would do well not to reject the clause at once, but to agree to the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who held out the hope that it might be amended at a future stage of the Bill somewhat in the direction which had been very generally indicated by hon. Members conversant with the subject.

After some further discussion,
Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

TRIENNIAL PARLIAMENTS BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

DR. KENEALY rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill for shortening the duration of Parliaments. The hon. Member proceeded to address the House at length in favour of triennial Parliaments. The hon. Member's address was received with great impatience, and

Mr. Speaker reminded him of the Rule of the House that the arguments of any Member addressing the House should be relevant to the subject-matter of his intended Motion. After some time—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

The hon. MEMBER continued his address, and concluded by moving—“That leave be given to bring in a Bill for shortening the Duration of Parliaments.”

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, on behalf of the Government, opposed the Motion, observing that the House had quite enough to do during the present Session without occupying itself with the discussion of the question of its own dissolution.

There were then loud cries for a division; but several hon. Members addressed a few words to the House.

MR. MONK regretted that the Government should have refused leave to introduce the Bill. It was not usual to take such a course, and there was nothing intrinsically wrong in the proposal itself. Of course it could not be expected that the Bill could be discussed this Session.

MR. DILLWYN regretted that the Government had not shown its usual courtesy in this matter.

MR. RERESFORD HOPE said, he thought the Government had shown too much courtesy in this matter, and he hoped that the House would summarily decide the issue.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the House had of late years been somewhat lax on the subject of the introduction of Bills. This was a question as to which there was a difference of opinion, and which might give rise to discussion; and he thought that at period of the Session it would not be wise to place on the Paper a Bill which could not be considered. The time might perhaps come when the subject could be properly discussed; but at present he thought it would be wise to refuse the introduction of a new Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 68; Majority 57.

NORWICH ELECTION.

JOINT ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION.

Message from the Commons that they have agreed to the Address to be presented to Her Majesty (under the provisions of the Act of the sixteenth year of Her present Majesty, chapter fifty-seven,) relating to the Election for the City of Norwich, to which they desire the concurrence of their Lordships.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LOED GRANMORE AND BROWNE rose to call the attention of the House to copy of a Letter from the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, and of their reply to the same; also to the present state of national education in Ireland; and to inquire if Her Majesty's Government contemplate any changes either as regards the present system of education in Ireland or of training teachers; and, if so, what would be those changes? The noble Lord said, he should not have intruded this interesting and difficult subject upon their Lordships had it not been that although Questions had been asked in both Houses of Parliament, no satisfactory assurances had been given on the part of the Government to those who, like himself, believing the national system properly carried out was of great value, had been somewhat alarmed by the letter of the Chief Secretary. A general misconception pervaded the minds of Members of both Houses on the subject, for they seemed to believe that it was only fair to extend what was the system in England to Ireland also. But the circumstances of the case were wholly different. In Ireland the schools on the national system were maintained almost exclusively by grants from the State, and the State had therefore the right to prescribe how the schools should be carried on, and that the system adopted should be such that children of no denomination should be excluded from them. But in England the denominational system prevailed, and a great portion of the expenses of national education was defrayed by voluntary contributions. Therefore, upon the principle that they who paid the piper should choose the tunes, the managers of English schools had a claim to regulate the instruction which Irish managers had not. As almost the entire expense of education in Ireland was paid by State grants, it followed that it should be national and not denominational. But was it true or not true that the national system in Ireland had ceased to have any value in that sense, and had become denominational? The famous letter of the late Lord Derby to the Duke of Leinster defined what was intended by national education. It was "united secular and separate religious instruction, a system from which all suspicion of proselytizing was banished." That was not the principle carried out in denominational schools; but as in Ireland

there were only 76 of those schools, with 180,000 children on their rolls, while there were on the rolls of other schools under the National Board 820,000 children, it could not be said that the denominational had superseded the national system. But the system had been departed from in respect to the training of teachers, which was first interfered with by the decision of the Roman Catholic Bishops at the Synod of Thurles. He would not dwell on the well-known O'Keeffe case, but there was a report afloat that the late Prime Minister (Mr. Gladstone) was so discontented with what had taken place with the conduct of the National Board on that occasion that if he had remained in office he would have had a responsible in the place of an irresponsible Board. The noble and learned Lord (Lord O'Hagan) seemed to signify a negative, and therefore the rumour was not correct; but he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) thought that would be a most desirable change. Though in Ireland no less than 80 per cent of the children were in what were called mixed schools, yet it was alleged that these were denominational, as in many of them the priest was the patron, and many of them adjoined the Roman Catholic chapel; but as the rules excluded denominational teaching, and 24,400 Protestant children were scattered through those schools, those children now benefited by the national system, and would be excluded under the denominational. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would not sanction any divergence from the national system in the schools, for if they did the Protestant children who attended them would get no education at all. It had been said that the national system in Ireland had been a failure, and in the other House of Parliament Mr. Lyon Playfair had stated that of the children educated in the Irish national schools, only 18 per cent could either read or write. A greater fallacy had never been uttered. The right hon. Gentleman had based his statistics on the number of children on the school rolls, which was 1,140,000; but the fact was that the average attendance did not amount to more than 400,000, and the children who qualified for examination did not amount to 300,000. Now, he would make a comparison of results as between Ireland and England. In Ireland something over 86 per cent of the children examined passed in reading. In England of the number so examined 88 per cent passed. In Ireland the 86 per cent passed in writing; in England 80 per cent. In Ireland 69 per cent passed in arithmetic; in England 70 per cent. Taking the total, something over 62 per cent of the children examined passed in Ireland and 59 per cent in England. He could not see how this could be called "a monstrous failure;" he thought it a great success. The insufficient attendances at schools in Ireland might in a great measure be accounted for by the fact that a large number of children in that country were employed at field labour, and that if compulsory education kept them from thus earning their bread, the State must not only provide education, but food and clothing. In 1866, the noble Lord who was then Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Lord Carlingford) wrote a letter to the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, suggesting certain changes, and in the letter of the present Chief Secretary those suggestions were referred to. If the recommendations in respect of the training of teachers made by a majority of the Commissioners were adopted, the result would be that the majority of the Irish national teachers would be trained by religious Orders of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Seeing that in countries where the Roman Catholic Church had plenitude of means and power the people were the most ignorant, and that all Roman Catholic countries where the Roman Catholic Church held sway were in a most unfortunate position—witness Spain and the Republic of South America—and as he should much regret such a result in Ireland as that which he had just indicated, he therefore hoped to receive from Her Majesty's Government a distinct assurance that there was no intention on their part to make any change in the national system in Ireland which would have the effect of making it denominational.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT dissented from the statement of the noble Lord that very little aid was contributed by voluntary effort towards education in Ireland. The 30 or 40 schools with which he had some connection paid half their expenses.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE stated that he and many others also contributed towards support of schools on these properties; but, nevertheless, voluntary contributions through Ireland did not amount to 1 per cent of the whole expenses.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that when he saw the Question of his noble Friend on the Paper, he felt some doubt as to what his exact meaning or object could be; because it appeared as if what his noble Friend wanted the Government to do was to repeat the declaration already made by the Representative of the Irish Government in the House of Commons. But he found from the speech of his noble Friend that his object was first to elicit something to calm the alarm which a debate held in the other House of Parliament some time ago had created in his mind; and next, to answer certain arguments put forward by Mr. Lyon Playfair. Now this was very irregular and inconvenient. Manifestly, it would be very inconvenient to be answering in that House speeches made at the other side of St. Stephen's Hall. It was satisfactory, however, to observe that the alarm of his noble Friend was not of a tempestuous or stormy character. The debate in "another place" was held in March, and the terrors of his noble Friend had been so slowly gathering that it was not until the 18th of June he came forward to have them allayed. It was not his (the Marquess of Salisbury's) business to impugn the national system in Ireland. Bad or good, it was the only one we had in that country, and the only one we were likely to have there, and therefore it was to the interest of all parties to make the best of it. His noble Friend had referred to the statistics brought forward by Mr. Lyon Playfair, and had quoted some figures in reply. Well, statistics were a very expansive article, and Irish statistics were endowed with a special elasticity, and he had no doubt the noble Lord would readily find statistics that would give him any information he might desire. He did not think it necessary on an occasion like the present to go into inquiries as to the number of illiterate persons in Ireland, or as to how many children of five years old went to school in that country, or as to whether a child of five years old ought to read and write; but the noble Lord seemed persuaded that there were scarcely any illiterate children in Ireland, and that it would rather do an injury than otherwise to increase the salaries of the teachers. He could not, however, pledge the Government to assist the noble Lord in this matter. But there seemed to be a general consensus of opinion that the success of the Irish national schools was not equal to what had been anticipated, and that the acquirements of the teachers were not up to the standard to which we in England were accustomed. An endeavour might be made to meet that state of things by either of two means. By means of payment for results they might enable managers to employ better teachers; or they might by a better course of training make better teachers themselves. He leant to the first as being the better mode of improving the teachers. If £43 a-year was the average salary received by the teachers in the Irish national schools, that could not be regarded as a satisfactory payment, and as his noble Friend was so satisfied with the national system in Ireland, he hoped that he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) would not think that a salary of £43 to the teachers—which was about the average earnings of a Lincolnshire labourer—was bound up with that system. He would not say a word which could be construed to indicate any intention to depart from the national system in Ireland. The question of dealing with training colleges in Ireland was surrounded with difficulties, in consequence of the views of their duty which were entertained by the heads of religious communities in Ireland. It was not his duty to give an opinion on those views; but there could be no doubt that a large portion of the people of this country regarded them in the same light as that in which his noble Friend looked at them, and it would hardly be possible to alter the system of the training colleges without entering on a course that would not be desirable. He had to say, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government had no intention to alter the system of training colleges. But, on the other hand, he did not see why they should be prevented from relying on the other plan, if it appeared to them that it would remedy the evils which were admitted to exist in connection with national education in Ireland.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he had expressed no opinion as to increasing the salaries of the national teachers.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that, as the noble Lord who had introduced this subject had referred to him, he hoped he might be allowed to add a few words to the discussion. He confessed that the letter of the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant did interest him very much, and gratify him not a little, because it showed that the Chief Secretaries in Governments of different Parties did recognize a fact rather underrated by the noble Marquess—namely, the necessity of good training to the success of national education in Ireland. In 1866, when he was Chief Secretary, he found that of the whole number of 7,472 teachers, 4,369 were untrained. The present Chief Secretary found that in 1874 no fewer than 6,118 out of the whole number of 9,900 were untrained. The noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne) had spoken of the training of teachers as if it were not an essential part of a system of national education. But everyone knew that without a well-trained body of teachers such a system must break down. In England and Scotland the teachers were trained for two years, while in Ireland those who were nominally trained received a course of training which extended over only five months. That being the state of things, he felt himself, when Chief Secretary, compelled to recognize what the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary again called attention to in 1874. Acting in conjunction with the Lord Lieutenant, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach wrote—

“It now only remains for his Grace to invite the special attention of the Board to the important subject embraced in Question No. 6. His Grace understands that in England there are 39 training schools with 2,894 students and a grant of £95,200; in Scotland five training schools with 704 students and a grant of £21,500; while in Ireland there is only one normal school with 218 students and a grant of £7,646, although this deficiency is to some extent supplemented by the system of model schools. It is further to be borne in mind that whereas two years is generally considered the minimum period of residence in a training school, the Irish teachers, with the exception of those who undergo an additional term of special training, remain only about five months in the Marlborough Street normal school. The existing insufficiency of teachers trained even to this extent cannot but injuriously affect the general standard of

LORD O'HAGAN, speaking as one of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, had a right to demand that when charges were made against them of being unfaithful to the system of which the administration was committed to them that they should be judged by their public acts and public declarations, not by the opinions scattered through the country and founded on misconceptions and misrepresentations. Looking to their acts and declarations, he said it was impossible for any of those who, in that House or elsewhere, had ventured to assail the system in a very gross and scandalous way, to establish the charges they made against a body of gentlemen—putting himself out of the question—of the highest position and the greatest intelligence, who had faithfully devoted themselves to the advancement of national education in Ireland—often in the face of great obloquy and much misconstruction. At present there were some 6,000 out of 9,000 teachers of national schools in Ireland who were utterly without training of any kind recognized by the State or regulated by the law of the land; and he thought that if attention was paid to the state of things in Ireland at that moment any Government would be disposed to take some risk and make some effort to redress existing deficiencies. The Commissioners had not proposed to do anything that would wound any religious susceptibilities. The proposition accepted by the Commissioners and supported by the noble Lord behind him (Lord Carlingford) was not that there should be denominational training for teachers, but that there should be non-vested training colleges established in Ireland on the same principles, moving on the same lines, and with the same results as the non-vested schools under the national system of education. It was very desirable that that moderate proposal should be considered by the Government, and he hoped the day was not far distant when they would have a satisfactory system of training for their teachers; without which, indeed, it would be impossible that education could progress as it ought to do in Ireland. As to the charges that had been made in that House and repeated at public meetings that the national system had proved a complete failure, and that it was a scandalous thing that such large sums should be spent upon it—that the people of Ireland, after 40 years, remain uneducated—were, he must say that that rested on a totally erroneous view of the history of national education. He would say that the system rested upon an utterly false basis. It was founded on the assumption that the Commissioners who first set up the National Board about the year 1831, from that time forward failed in the education of the entire population of Ireland. A more fallacious assumption than that it was impossible to educate the people of Ireland. The Board had to fight against almost every denomination. The people of the Established Church stood aloof, and for some years Unitarian and Wesleyan Methodists and Presbyterians were extremely hostile to it; it was not until 10 years after its establishment that they began to take advantage of it. As to Catholics, having suffered to a great degree from want of schools, they showed more willingness to accept of it, and the late Archbishop of Dublin, Murray—one of the best men—was for many years a member of the Board, and, in consequence of his great confidence in the Board, he was a great support to the Board, and a great confidence in the Board was shown by the religiousists. But it was in the closing years of the late century that the people of the Established Church at all took to the system. In Connaught, however, the Roman Catholics resisted the system throughout, and elsewhere there was a partial opposition. But, in spite of those difficulties, the system was so successful that the whole of Ireland from its centre to its circumference was now studded with schools. It had been denounced in the House of Parliament as a gross failure; what were the facts? In 1831 there were 2,337 national schools, and 4,704; in 1861, 5,836; in 1871, 6,914. Moreover, according to the Returns, the percentage of illiterate persons in Ireland in 1831 was 46·8; in 1861, 33·4; in 1871, 33·4. But as these figures included children down to the age of 15, it might be thought more satisfactory to take the percentage of illiterate persons between 15 and 20. That percentage had been reduced from 37·4 in 1831 to 27·4 in 1871. Instead of the system having been a gross failure, it had been a opinion, a great success and a great blessing, and it seemed to him to be the duty of those who took an interest in Ireland and desired that the people should become really intelligent and loyal to assist as far as they could in promoting a system which had produced the results he had described.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, they were bound to guard most jealously against any attempt to depart from the original principle upon which Parliament had founded the system of education now in operation in Ireland, and it was because he saw traces of such a disposition that he was thankful to find that there was no wish either on the part of the House or on the part of the Government to depart from the principles hitherto observed. He wished to ask the noble and learned Lord why the Commission in their Report this year had omitted the column relating to Mixed Education?

LORD O'HAGAN said, he was not aware that it had been done. He would make inquiries and inform the noble Viscount on a future day.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH, said, he had been a manager of a school under the national system in Ireland, and in relation to the noble and learned Lord's defence of the National Board of Education in that country against misrepresentations and accusations, he was unable to remember the time when the Board was not subjected to these, or when the conduct of its members was supposed to be free from political and partizan influences. That was owing to an original and serious defect in its constitution. All the Commissioners on the Board, or nearly all of them, were appointed from time to time by the Government of the day, and the result was that they had in a country where political partizanship and prejudice ran high, a succession of appointments, which, if not always of a political character, were at least open to the imputation of being so. That was a serious defect; as was also the fact that none of its rules were absolutely unalterable by the Board itself, and therefore there was always a temptation to one party or the other in the Board to alter them, and that further had laid them open to the imputation of being inclined to make changes of a sectarian or religious character. He had long felt that the true principle on which Irish education should be dealt was that the present semi-political Board should be changed for three, or even one, paid Commissioner, irremovable except for misconduct, and that the fundamental rules of the system on which education should be administered should be unalterable. In other words, he would like to see something more corresponding to the Education Department of England. If that change were made, little further would be needed, except improvements in detail; for the Irish national system as a whole was the best possible for Ireland, and so highly did he esteem it that he could not help regretting it had not been transferred to this country.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he entirely concurred in the observations that had fallen from the noble Lord the late Chief Secretary for Ireland and from the right rev. Prelate, and urged that steps should be taken to provide a larger supply of educated teachers for Irish schools.

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES AND MARRIAGE LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord Inchiquin.)

(NO. 117.) SECOND READING.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD INCHQUIN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its purpose was to empower the Irish Church Synod to raise the fees for marriage licences in Ireland from a sum not exceeding 5s. to a sum not exceeding 20s. in such cases as might be thought necessary. The measure had received the sanction of the Irish Church Synod and of the Primate of Ireland; the latter stating that he saw no ground for the fear which had been expressed that the raising of the marriage licence fees would tend to drive persons to be married by the Registrar.

—(The Lord Inchiquin.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was afraid that the Bill, if passed as it stood, would incline the poorer classes in Ireland to prefer the cheaper ceremony of marriage by the Registrar to the more expensive religious ceremony. He suggested that the noble Lord should withdraw the measure for the present Session, with the view of its receiving further consideration and amendment before it was re-introduced.

Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ECCLESIASTICAL FEES REDISTRIBUTION
BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make provision for the redistribution of certain Ecclesiastical Fees—Was presented by The Lord Archbishop of CANTERBURY; read 1st. (No. 161.)

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, half past Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 18th June, 1875.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Entail Amendment (Scotland)* [212]; Police Constables (Scotland)* [213].

Second Reading—Pharmacy [175].

Committee—Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment (re-comm.) [116]—R.P.; Infanticide* [43]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Juries (Ireland)* [206].

Considered as amended—Medical Acts Amendment (College of Surgeons)* [100].

Third Reading—National Debt (Sinking Fund) [142], debate adjourned.

Withdrawn—Dean Forest and Hundred of Saint Briavels* [78].

The House met at Two of the clock.

MERCANTILE MARINE—POOLE
HARBOUR.—QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in view of the great public benefit which would be the result of so deepening the water over the bar at Poole Harbour as to make it available for a Harbour of Refuge, the Government would be willing to take into favourable consideration an application that they should contribute some proportion of the necessary cost, on terms similar to those on which the Treasury have recently consented to grant funds in aid of the Harbour at Ardglass?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, the Government would not be justified in making contributions from the public rates for the cost of the deepening the water over the bar at Poole Harbour, so as to make it available for a harbour of refuge. There was no analogy or similarity whatever between the harbour of Poole and that at Ardglass, towards which the Treasury had recently consented to grant funds.

IRELAND—CLONMEL UNION BUILD-ING DEBT.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MOORE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he has considered the Memorial of the Guardians of the Clonmel Union, dated the 18th of February last, praying that the Government will take into consideration the exceptional circumstances of that Union, the only one in Ireland whose building debt was not remitted by the Government, and if the ratepayers are justified in the hope that they will be placed on the same footing as regards cost of building their workhouse as all the other unions of Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Government had no power to act in the manner referred to. Besides, it would be laying down a precedent which he did not think it would be well to set.

IRELAND—RECORDERS' COURTS.
QUESTION.

MR. MURPHY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If the Government will support the Bill now before the House for enlarging the Local Jurisdiction of the Recorders' Courts of Cork and Belfast in Admiralty cases; and, if so, whether, having regard to the present state of Business, and the consequent improbability of the Bill passing during this Session, they would support, or be themselves prepared to carry out, legislation on the subject next year?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET), in reply, said, it was the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill next year to deal, amongst other subjects, with the jurisdiction of the Recorders' Courts of Cork and Belfast in Admiralty cases. As there was no chance of carrying any measure of the kind that year, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Bill forward.

The Lord Chancellor

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE CLOCK TOWER LIGHT.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the gas signal light on the Clock Tower of this House has been in use for three Sessions; and if it is a fact that the contractors have not yet been paid for it?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: It is true, Sir, that the gas light on the Clock Tower has been in use for three Sessions, and it is a fact that the Messrs. Wigram have not yet been paid for it; through a delay, which I regret, has risen from unavoidable circumstances. But the difficulties, I have reason to hope, will shortly be removed, and a payment will then be made.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—STREET WATERING AND CLEANSING.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether any power is vested in the Board enabling it to ensure the proper watering and cleansing of the streets and thoroughfares of the Metropolis, or whether these necessary operations have to be left to the action of thirty-nine separate independent local authorities?

SIR JAMES HOGG: Sir, in answer to the Question of the noble Lord, I have to state that the Metropolitan Board have no actual control over the thoroughfares of the Metropolis so as to ensure watering and cleansing. This power is specially conferred upon the vestries and district boards by Act of Parliament. Complaints are sometimes made on this and other subjects to the Metropolitan Board, who always communicate with the vestry or district board in question. I am bound to add that all communications are received in the most friendly spirit, and the grievances removed as far as can be done. The only exception to the powers of vestries, &c., as regards roads is the Victoria Embankment, which, by an Act of Parliament passed in 1872, is placed under the Metropolitan Board as regards cleansing, lighting, and paving.

ARMY—ATTENDANCE OF CATHOLIC SOLDIERS AT MASS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. PARNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Under Secretary of State for War, in reply to a Memorial from the Catholic Union of Ireland, relative to the attendance of Catholic Soldiers at Mass on certain specified days, stated that the Right honourable Gentleman had no objection to officers commanding giving facilities to the troops of any denomination to attend Divine Service if asked to do so by their clergy, but that he did not consider that commanding officers should take the initiative in such a matter; whether the case of those men of the Meath Militia quartered in barracks, who were confined to barracks during the hours of one Divine Service, and engaged in the usual parades during the hours of the other Divine Services, of the denomination to which they belonged, after a request had been made by the Chaplain that they might be allowed to attend one service, is contrary to the intention of the Right honourable Gentleman as conveyed in the above-mentioned reply; and, whether the Right honourable Gentleman would think it expedient to draw the attention of officers commanding Irish Militia regiments to that mentioned reply in order to prevent future misunderstanding?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the hon. Gentleman was correct in saying that a reply of the nature described was sent by the Under Secretary of State for War. It had reference not merely to Roman Catholic soldiers, but to the troops of every denomination. He was informed in the case of the Meath Militia that the men were not confined to barracks, and the parade took place in the ordinary way. Only one man asked permission to attend service, which was granted, and the man fell out and left. He did not think it was his duty to call the attention of officers commanding Irish Militia regiments to the reply, any more than to direct the attention to it of officers commanding other regiments.

MR. WHALLEY, referring to the soldiers who bore the canopy over the Cardinal Archbishop at the College at Ladbroke Road, on the 31st of May, wished to know if it was not inconsistent with the regulations that soldiers should appear at Church in full dress?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could give no information to the hon. Member upon the subject, as he had not given him any Notice of the Question.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS—CONTINUANCE RETURNS.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government would consent to an Address for information, in continuance of that furnished under the Address of the 27th of July 1874, with reference to the Laws, Ordinances, and Regulations relating to Monastic and Conventual Institutions; and within what period such continued information would be ready for delivery to the Members of this House?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that Papers on the subject had been laid on the Table on the 4th of March last, relating to France, Germany, Sweden, Italy, Belgium, Austria, and Spain. His hon. Friend, however, was not satisfied with those Papers, and requested him (Mr. Bourke) to lay further Papers on the Table and obtain other information upon the subject, more particularly from Dresden, Würtemberg, and other smaller States in Germany. Those Papers had been received at the Foreign Office. They were considerably voluminous. They were printed, and would be laid on the Table in a few days. Now, however, the hon. Gentleman wished to have additional information, without stating where it was to be obtained from or what was to be its nature. He would be happy to get for him all the information he could procure, but he could give him no decided answer as to when he would be able to lay it upon the Table of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that, as it was always understood that a continued Return was to be made in the terms of the original Return, he would on a future day ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State, whether he would continue down to the present time the information furnished under the Address of the 27th of July last.

Mr. Whalley

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE COLONY—BOUNDARY OF DELAGOA BAY.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in the public journals, that the President of the French Republic has made his award as to the boundary between the British and Portuguese dominions in East Africa, and that the same is adverse to the claims of this Country; when the Papers will be laid upon the Table of the House; and, whether the Government will make available the visit of the Sultan of Zanzibar to make further arrangements for the protection of British interests within his dominions with a view to the development of legitimate commerce, and thereby, and also by such other means as have been devised or may be found requisite, more effectually checking and suppressing within his dominions the traffic in slaves?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, we have no official knowledge of the result of the arbitration under a reference made on the 10th of September, 1873, as to the British and Portuguese boundaries in East Africa; but from communications which have reached the Foreign Office I have little doubt that the fact is that the President of the French Republic has made his award as to the boundary between the British and Portuguese dominions in East Africa, and that the same is adverse to the claims of this country. When the official award reaches us we shall be prepared to lay Papers on the Table. As to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, I would remind him that the Seyyid of Zanzibar is in this country as a guest of the British Government, and that the present is not therefore a time to press upon him claims or requests which he might consider inopportune; but I have no doubt that before he leaves our shores communications will pass between His Highness and Her Majesty's Government on the subject of the protection of British interests within his dominions and the checking and suppressing of the traffic in slaves, and Her Majesty's Government entertain no doubt of the sincere desire of His Highness to meet their wishes in both respects.

PUBLIC HEALTH—SMALL POX IN STAFFORDSHIRE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether any communication has been received respecting an outbreak of small-pox in Great Barr, Staffordshire; and, whether it is a fact that such outbreak was to be traced to the occupation of a house, without previous disinfection, in which cases of small-pox had occurred; and, if so, by whose fault it is that such disinfection was not provided for?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he had received no information in reference to the subject referred to by the hon. Member. The last Quarterly Returns of the Registrar General showed an unusual mortality in the Walsall Union, of which Great Barr formed a part, and inquiries had been made of the sanitary authorities on the subject. If the alleged outbreak arose from the occupation without previous disinfection of a house in which the disease had existed, the person letting the house would be liable to a penalty of £30. Moreover, if the sanitary authorities had a medical certificate to the effect that disinfection was necessary, and it was not done satisfactorily, they might cause the work to be performed, and charge the owner or occupier with the cost.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMEND-
MENT (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 116.]

(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck,
Mr. William Henry Smith.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 17th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*Master and Seamen (Part III. of Merchant

Clause 9 (Advance notes illegal).

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 20, to leave out from the words "any document," to the word "advanced," in line 29, both inclusive.—(Mr. Hamond.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'any document' stand part of the Clause."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that after the debate last night, the Government had decided to adopt as a compromise the Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Bates), that "advance notes" should be to the extent of one month's wages in advance. The clause would then read as follows:—

"Any document authorizing or purporting to authorize the payment of money on account of a seaman's wages, excepting to the extent of one month's wages in advance, shall be void."

The Committee were aware that the clause was inserted in the Bill on the strong recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, and with respect to preventing ships going to sea in a condition dangerously unseaworthy—a question upon which the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had raised a great sensation in the mind of the public throughout the country—the Royal Commissioners felt that the anticipation of wages generally for debauchery at the moment of taking ships to sea was at the very root of the question. It was a fact that there were many cases in which parties received advance notes and shipped for voyages, who never intended to carry out their contract, and continued to evade it; many cases also in which the advance note was demanded as a right without being at all needed, and many cases in which it went straight to crimps, who finally turned out their victims to take charge of a ship so drunk and diseased that they had to be put on shore in going down Channel, and anybody got on board to take their place. The advance note had become a custom—a vicious custom—since 1850. It was recognized then by law, but had been since struck out of the Acts, and had now no legal validity at all. At the same time, there were such practical difficulties pointed out on the previous night in connection with the prohibition of all advance notes that the Government had come to the conclusion to adopt the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Plymouth, and that they should limit the amount of advance notes to one month's wages. He (Sir Charles Adderley) hoped the Committee would accept that concession on the part of the Government, who, at the same time, were not shrinking from the performance of their duty in their endeavours to pass this measure as it was recommended by the Royal Commission. The adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Plymouth, after the word "wages," in the clause would, he hoped, meet the wishes of the Committee; and certain words in the 2nd and 3rd sub-sections would then be omitted from the clause. By a provision in the Bill masters of ships would be enabled to provide and supply necessaries at starting on a voyage to sailors on reasonable terms.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN might say he was rather sorry that the Government did not on the previous night make a defence of the principle of the clause in reference to the advance notes. The right hon. Gentleman told them that if the Amendment was agreed to, it would be fatal to the clause, and if it was negatived, he would then state what was to be done. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) thought it rather unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman did not stick to his guns. He was reluctant to address the Committee on points that were technical of which he had no knowledge; and the reason why he now rose was a strong feeling in respect to the question of the advance note among his constituents. He was informed that there had been a regular trade carried on in the North of England in connection with the advance note system, and that persons who had no thought of going to sea entered into contracts, shipped as for the voyage, and when they had got as far as Deal, Walmer, or Dover, got landed there. When apprehended they were committed to gaol, and the expense of maintaining them there fell unfortunately upon the ratepayers. They did not care about spending some time in prison, because they regarded the bonus they had obtained by their fraudulent conduct as a sufficient compensation. By a Return made he found that in 12 months upwards of 80 of these persons had been sent to gaol in Sandwich for the offence of violating their contract, and the cost of keeping them was felt deeply by his constituents, inasmuch as there was no just reason whatever why this expense should fall upon their particular locality. During the same period, the number of committals for other offences in the same gaol was only about 10, and the House would therefore see that his constituents had reason for complaint. If the expenses were to be borne by the Mercantile Marine Board or any other Board, and not by the ratepayers, he should feel content, or else let the fines, which under the present law were paid into the Imperial Treasury, go to the assistance of the local rates of those places upon which the expenses of the maintenance of the imprisoned seamen fell. All he wanted was fair play. The Committee were told on the previous night that the abolition of the advance note system would be the cause of great loss and suffering to the poor wives and families of sailors. Whatever might be said in favour of the system, it was unfortunate that the money which should reach the wives and children of many of the sailors was spent in drink, owing, in a great measure, to the advance note system; whilst no one could object to a well-regulated system of advances, by which it should be made certain that the money advanced actually went to those wives and children. Referring to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. T. E. Smith), he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not adopt it, instead of consenting to an Amendment which happened to come from his own side of the House, and which would practically continue and give a new status to the advance note system. For in directly legalizing an advance note to the extent of one month's wages, he was legalizing nineteen-twentieths of these notes, which seldom advanced more than that amount.

Lord ESLINGTON, as one of the Royal Commissioners, felt responsibility for the recommendations in reference to the advance notes. He believed that the percentage of seamen who received a greater advance than a month's wages was extremely small, and therefore he could not agree to accept that as a concession. At the same time, he had never concealed from himself nor from any of the Commissioners the difficulty of carrying out the proposed recommendation. He regretted that it was so, and that the sense of the House of Commons had not been taken on the question of advance notes. He thought it would be satisfactory to the country and to himself if it had been so settled, because it was a question surrounded with difficulties which it seemed impossible to settle in the way proposed. It therefore might well be left to the Legislature to settle. It was, in his opinion, a question for the House of Commons to abolish the note.

Sir Charles Adderley

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was one of those who, on the previous night, made a proposal that a fortnight's wages be advanced, and on the whole he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had in some measure met the wish of the Committee. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) regretted that as regarded the foreign trade the question remained as it was. He thought that the reduction in the advance note might be made by degrees. He, therefore, proposed that the right hon. Gentleman should make the advance note for a fortnight at home and a month abroad.

MR. MACDONALD said, he felt regret that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had abandoned the principle laid down by the Royal Commission; and he ventured to say that the course now taken up in reference to the advance note would be regretted by the country, and that if the right hon. Gentleman had adopted even the suggestion of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) it would have been far more valuable. Suppose the man were to receive £20, the whole might be put into one advance note. He must say that the Government had abandoned the whole principle of the Bill on this subject. All that was now left was an illusion and a sham. It would be more honest to give up the whole question at the nod of the ship-owners of the House, and say candidly they had done so. They would never have the condition of the seamen improved so long as the vicious and wicked system contained in the advance note system was allowed to remain. Sailors were apt to be imposed upon, and it was most important they should be saved from the intemperance connected with the system of advance notes.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT said, he was extremely surprised at the remarks which were made last night and to-day by the hon. Member for Stafford. On Wednesday the hon. Member said that of all classes in the world the working classes were people who could best take care of themselves, and yet now he said there was a portion of those working classes—namely, the sailors of this country—that required to be protected from drunkenness, and should be deprived of drink by the Legislature of the country. There was one thing which Members of his (Sir Walter Barttelot's)

Party had often insisted on—namely, that there should be freedom of contract. Last night the President of the Board of Trade frequently told the House that we had been continually passing Acts of Parliament to deprive ourselves of the right of free contract. He (Sir Walter Barttelot) should like to know when those Acts were passed. There was, no doubt, the Truck Act, and the right hon. Gentleman introduced into a section of this Bill the most objectionable form of truck that could be. He was glad his right hon. Friend had thought it wise and prudent to modify that which he stated so decidedly last night. The only person he was sorry for was his right hon. Friend himself, who had found it absolutely necessary to reverse all that he stated last night, but who had now come to his senses, and acknowledged that free contract ought to be allowed between man and man.

MR. MUNTZ thought the proposal of the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Bates) would do very well for long voyages, but not for short ones. When a voyage was undertaken from Hull to any of the Dutch or Danish ports it frequently happened that the vessel was back again within a month. Sailors were not all so silly as they were represented to be, and could very well take care of themselves, and he did not see any reason for retaining that clause in any form now that its principle had been abandoned.

MR. BATES considered a month's advance note not more than sufficient for sailors engaged in a voyage to India, round the Cape of Good Hope. By the Suez Canal route, Jack had many opportunities of getting ashore, inasmuch as a steamer made four or five voyages a year by this route, whereas by the Cape route he could only do so once in a voyage of perhaps 10 or 12 months. He was certainly opposed to the proposal that the note should not exceed £1, for it was necessary to remember that the mates and other officers applied more frequently for the advance note than the common sailors did, and to them an advance of £1 would be altogether insufficient. It had been asked if they were going to give advance notes for a month on short voyages, but it did not follow that they should do so from their arranging that the advance note should not be for a longer period than one month.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY was of opinion that the Amendment would altogether nullify the clause and throw discredit on the recommendations of the Royal Commission. The action of the Government in this matter reminded him of the long pendulum of a cottage clock. Their first swing, as shown in the Bill which abolished all advances, went far beyond the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and now they had in the course of debate swung round to a point far short of that recommendation. Why could not the advance note be abolished, while the system of advances was retained? In that way the shipowner would only oblige the good men, and they would get hard cash; whereas all the remarks of the Commissioners related to the form of advance note, conditional on the seaman going to sea, which was cashed through the medium of the crimp and only enabled the sailor to get one-sixth of its value. He trusted the Amendment would be rejected.

MR. RATHBONE expressed his regret that the Government had yielded on this point so far as to allow of an advance note even for a month. While agreeing with the opinions expressed by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex, it had always seemed to him very doubtful whether it was wise to interfere with freedom of contract; but if we did so, we ought to give some direction to the shipowner as to the course he ought to pursue. The shipowners who gave advances in excess of those usually given in the trade, were those who provided inferior food or accommodation for the sailor, whom they sought to tempt by the amount of the advance. In his judgment the Amendment which the Government ought to have accepted was that of the junior Member for Hull (Mr. Wilson), who proposed that a fortnight's advance should be given in short and a month's advance in long voyages. It would be impossible to stop advances in foreign countries where such advances were legal, but still it would be well if some limitation were placed on them.

MR. HAMOND said, he was ready to accept the proposal of the President of the Board of Trade, that advance notes should be in all cases limited to one month. He would therefore, by permission of the Committee, withdraw his own Amendment.

MR. T. E. SMITH remarked that the Government had abandoned what would have been a great boon to seamen. He believed ships were lost soon after leaving port through the men being enervated by dissipation on shore. It was not so much that the men were drunk, as that they were in a state of semi-delirium tremens, the consequence being that, say on leaving the Mersey and getting into the Channel, they were unequal to the work required for the safe navigation of the vessel. He desired before the Amendment was withdrawn to direct the attention of the House to the difference between advances and advance notes. The latter could only be cashed under a heavy discount, and there was no such thing as advance notes in foreign countries, where, if an advance was made, the sailor received it in hard cash.

MR. GOURLEY held that it was impossible to dispense with advance notes, although shipowners would be glad to see them abolished. He thought that one of the first things which ought to be done in this matter was to put a stop to crimps and crimp boatmen, by which means desertion from ships would be greatly obviated. He would express the hope that the Committee would accept the reasonable concession of the President of the Board of Trade.

LORD ELCHO said, he was in favour of the clause being struck out altogether. He deprecated any interference on the part of the State between two grown men in their contracts and dealings with each other. To say they should not pay a sailor on the day before he sailed because the day after he might be unfit to navigate the ship, was like saying they should not pay a man his wages on Saturday because he might get drunk and be unable to go to church on the Sunday. It was a case of State-help versus self-help, and he respectfully entered his protest against all that kind of legislation, believing that they had no right to interfere in contracts between men, and believing that if they embarked on a dangerous course of interference they would do a great deal of harm. They ought to look for the safety of ships to other causes than this.

MR. STEVENSON wished to get rid of advance notes altogether, and he hoped the Committee would reduce them to the smallest amount, with the view to the ultimate removal of the mischievous system. They were quite different documents from the monthly notes payable to the family of a sailor during his absence.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he preferred the advance note to cash advances. At present the advance note was not a document of legal obligation. Advance notes or advances were given to enable sailors to pay what they owed on shore. Both were liable to great abuses, and he wished he could see his way to getting rid of them. The object, however, was a good one. It was to enable a sailor to live on credit whilst waiting for a ship. The evil attending them was owing to the improvident habits of sailors. During the strike at Cardiff a large number of sailors in the port waiting for ships were taken into different lodging-houses, where they were lodged and fed on the strength of those notes. What would sailors do unless they could obtain credit in the belief that either these notes or advances would be given to them? No doubt, the note had sometimes to be discounted at a heavy loss; but then the crimp had to protect himself against the chance of desertion on the part of the men and the advance note not being paid. The advance note was not payable till the sailor had actually sailed, but suppose instead of the advance note the sailor got an advance, the temptation to desert before sailing would be much greater, because when he had money in his pocket he would get rid of it a great deal faster, and perhaps find himself sooner in the prison mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.) The allotment note was, of course, a totally different thing, against which nothing could be said.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that this was not a question of interference with the freedom of contract, but the question was, whether they should give validity to a particular document connected with the payment of wages. Every assistance should be given in the way of getting good crews. The reason why shipowners could not get good crews now was this, that whereas formerly they could examine the men for themselves, they were now obliged to go before a Government officer with the whole pack of them, the ~~one~~ knew nothing whatever about and the men came before him one after another like a flock of sheep. Shipowners regarded that as a great hardship.

MR. GORST contended that no special advantage should be given to advance notes, but that they should be left to the ordinary and usual law of the land. They were documents of which the law took no peculiar recognition, and the declaration in the Bill would prevent men making a contract which would be perfectly lawful in any other trade. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), that if the Committee attempted in any way to interfere with freedom of contract, they would get themselves into inextricable difficulties. While willing, however, to accept the Amendment of the Government, in his opinion the best plan would be to omit the clause altogether.

SIR ANDREW LUSK rose simply to thank the right hon. Gentleman and the Government for trying to meet the difficulties in this case in a kindly and friendly spirit. This was a matter which must be compromised in some way or other. We must learn to give as well as take.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN protested against some of the arguments used by his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), who seemed to have forgotten the principles which governed our legislation in the Factory and Truck Acts. The question was, whether any interference was required on behalf of the sailors, and if so he hoped that the bugbear of interference with freedom of contract would not prevent the House from interfering. He hoped that as the question had been fully discussed the House would now go to a division unless something tangible were proposed by the Government.

LORD ELCHO said, there was the most marked difference in the spirit which guided Parliament at the time when Lord Shaftesbury introduced his factory legislation and Sir James Graham resisted it and now. Whereas the Liberalism of those days was in favour of the removal of restrictions on freedom of contract, except in the case of women and children, the Liberalism of these days was in favour of restriction upon full-grown men.

MR. HENLEY said, he was very glad the Government had made the alteration proposed in the clause, though he thought the Act would have done very well without Clause 9. For the last 40 years the legislation between seamen and shipowners had gone on the assumption that all seamen were fools and all shipowners knaves. This Bill gave some liberty within the limits proposed, for treating both parties as fools it left them to do as they pleased within those limits. That was a return to a wholesomer state of things.

MR. D. JENKINS thanked the Government for what they had done, which would be a great boon to seamen.

Amendment (Mr. Hamond), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, in page 3, line 21, after "wages" insert "excepting to the extent of one month's wages in advance"—(Mr. Bates), agreed to.

MR. GORST moved an Amendment in order as he said to give effect to a recommendation of the Royal Commission. He understood the Royal Commissioners only wished to put a stop to advance notes, and not to stop advances in cash; and he proposed to omit from the clause certain words, with the view of leaving cash advances to seamen perfectly free from certain legal control, although advances on notes should be stopped.

MR. T. E. SMITH thought that the Amendment was a desirable one.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he had no objection to it, because advances being made in money were simply in the nature of presents or loans which really required no legislation to empower, and which personal caution would keep within safe bounds.

Amendment agreed to.

On Question, That the Clause, as amended, be agreed to?

MR. MUNTZ moved its rejection on the ground that it was uncalled for, unnecessary, and unwise; and the Committee ought to pause before they interfered in the way proposed with a very important interest.

MR. NORWOOD said, the clause, as amended, was as unsatisfactory as it could be, it being "neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring." It gave statutable recognition to the system of advance notes, which had never yet been anything more than promises to pay, possessing no legal validity, unless accepted by the party on which they were drawn.

MR. MACGREGOR said, if the clause was to be accepted at all, the compromise could not be more satisfactory; but he candidly stated that, while he appreciated the great amount of attention that had been bestowed on it, he thought it would be more satisfactory to the outside world if they abandoned the clause altogether. After all their fighting and wrangling, they had practically done nothing more than put things into the exact position they were in at present. No advances were given now for a longer period than a month, except in very exceptional circumstances, and these exceptional circumstances would be met by the provision that they should be allowed to advance more in cash. Therefore they were exactly as they were, and it was a pity they should go forth to the world and say they had done something when they had done nothing at all.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that if the clause had been modified according to the Amendment of the junior Member for Hull (Mr. Wilson) he should have supported it, but in its then emasculated state it was unworthy insertion in an Act of Parliament.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he also felt compelled to vote against the clause in its amended form. He had expressed to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Adderley) his readiness to give his clause as it originally stood every support, but its character had been entirely changed. The Government had thrown over the Report of the Royal Commission, they had thrown over their own views, and had at the same time effected no practical solution of the question.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the Committee was wrong in assuming that the Bill would legalize advance notes, because there was nothing illegal in them. It was true they could not be sued upon, but there was no law to prevent the shipowner from deducting the amount advanced upon them.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, the clause initiated a very pernicious principle in our legislation. There was a growing feeling amongst the newly-enfranchised classes that they should come to Parliament and ask for protection for their special interests; but he had on all occasions endeavoured to point out to his constituents that the true course of freedom and independence was to have to do as little with Parliament as possible with regard to their private welfare. He should vote against the clause, as embodying that most mischievous principle of interference with the private affairs of people.

MR. BATES contended that the clause with the Amendment which had been accepted by the Government would effect an important improvement in the law. As one of the largest owners of sailing ships in that or any other country, he could say that the custom now was in many cases of long voyages to make advances amounting to two months' wages, but under the clause it would be limited to one.

MR. HERMON said, he should vote against the clause, on the ground that he was opposed to any interference with freedom of contract. It was absurd to say that a man who was capable of exercising the franchise was unable to make a simple contract for himself to the amount of about 30s.

MR. WILSON supported the Amendment for the withdrawal of the clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the question of advance notes had for a long series of years been a source of difficulty in legislating for merchant shipping. The system of advance notes, however, was very different from that of advances; and the object in view was not to interfere with freedom of contract, but to restrain that particular instrument which was so liable to abuse. The Government, therefore, proposed to prohibit advance notes, but they found that the matter would have to be dealt with in a tentative manner, which they endeavoured to do by this clause in a form which would recognize the desirability of restricting, and, if possible, of ultimately putting an end to advance notes. If they were too far in advance of public opinion the law would probably be evaded, and the clause, while imposing some restrictions at present, might lead hereafter to further restrictions of the systems. If the Committee rejected it it would be construed by the public, after the recommendation of the Royal Commission, that the advance note system was a good one, or that Parliament was unable to deal with it, although it was abundantly clear that it was a system requiring amendment.

MR. FIELDEN objected to the clause, because of its interference with freedom of contract in a very serious manner. In this kind of legislation Parliament assumed that the workman was less independent than formerly, whereas they were getting more and more so, and this paternal legislation was less required than ever.

MR. MACIVER expressed a hope that the division, if taken, would be upon the question whether the Report of the Royal Commission on this question should be upheld or not.

MR. E. J. REED suggested that, in deference to the opinion entertained on his side of the House, and also to the opinion entertained generally on the Ministerial side, the Government should withdraw the clause.

MR. DISRAELI: I confess that when I came down to the House I was under the impression, after what happened last night, that the clause would not be insisted upon; but, in consequence of suggestions which were very freely given on both sides of the House, and certainly on the side opposite, it was supposed that the clause could be so modified that it would meet with the general acceptance of the Committee. My own impression has not changed upon it. It appeared to me that if we carried the clause, it should be as it originally stood in deference to the Royal Commission—and, as far as I am concerned, entirely in deference to the Royal Commission—because the principle is one which if it were introduced into general legislation could not be approved of, for it involves an interference with the freedom of contract, and I believe that the maintenance of freedom of contract is one of the necessary conditions of the commercial and manufacturing greatness of the country. Certainly, I was under the impression that the clause, as originally planned, was conceived in respectful deference to the Royal Commission—a Commission that was entitled to the respectful consideration of the House. Since then I have seen that clause modified and diminished in its effect and influence in a very remarkable manner, and now we are called upon to decide upon that clause. I must say, so far as I can observe the feeling of the Committee, that in its diminished and attenu-ated form the clause does not appear to me to have the confidence of either side. I should be perfectly prepared myself to support a clause on this subject conceived in the spirit of the recommendations of the Royal Commission. Whatever might be my own opinions upon the subject, believing that it would be the predominant feeling of the Committee on both sides, I should be perfectly prepared to support that; but when I find the issue before us has assumed the character which the present clause has, and believing, as I do, that it is not sanctioned by the majority on either side of this House, I myself am of opinion that it would not be wise to oppose the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham.

Question put, and negatived; Clause struck out accordingly.

Clause 10 (Time of payment and effect of non-payment of wages).

MR. RATHBONE moved an Amendment providing that in the case of proceedings for the recovery of wages not exceeding £50 in amount, any Court of Summary Jurisdiction before which the case might in the first instance be heard, should have power to refer it to the Local Court of Admiralty for decision.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he could not recognize the principle proposed, which would partially abolish the jurisdiction of County Courts.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Settlement of wages).

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, as an Amendment, in page 5, line 13, to leave out "or state" to "superintendent," in line 14, with the view of rejecting the superintendent of Mercantile Marine as an arbiter in cases of dispute between master and man.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PALMER moved an Amendment to make it compulsory upon the superintendent of the Mercantile Marine to give a receipt for wages where a seaman was absent or incapable. As the clause stood it was only permissive.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 32, to leave out the word "may," in order to insert the word "shall."<sup>s</sup>—(Mr. Palmer.)

Mr. Disraeli

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment on the ground that it was preferable to leave it to the option of the superintendent as to whether he would receive wages on behalf of absent seamen.

Question put, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 251; Noes 116: Majority 135.

On the Motion of Mr. NORWOOD, the following Proviso inserted at end of Clause:—

"11. In cases where any seaman shall refuse or neglect to receive his wages, it shall be lawful for the master or owner to deposit the same with the superintendent, and in any legal proceedings thereafter brought by such seaman he shall not recover costs unless the amount awarded exceeds the sum deposited with the said superintendent."

On Question, That the Clause, as amended, be agreed to?

MR. BATES moved its omission.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Charges against officers).

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 12, to insert after "gross" the words "neglect of duty." Certificates were sometimes suspended simply on account of errors of judgment. That, he thought, was rather hard; but it was a different thing in cases of gross neglect of duty, which ought to be provided for.

MR. RATHBONE opposed the Amendment, on the ground that in the case of a preliminary inquiry the introduction of the words would be mischievous.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that these words would involve an alteration of the existing law, which it was not desirable to do, except for sufficient reason. He believed that the word "misconduct" was quite sufficient to cover all serious cases of neglect of duty, and there was strong reason for using the same word that was found in the existing law.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was desirable to deal with masters and seamen on the same footing. That was done in Clause 13; but by Clause 17 a seaman guilty of "gross neglect of duty" would be liable to imprisonment, while the master would not be liable to imprisonment at all.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY denied that there was any inconsistency between the 12th and 17th clauses. If an officer had his certificate cancelled it was ruin to him for life, and a much severer punishment than could under the Bill be inflicted on a seaman.

MR. HERSCHELL said, the only question they had to consider was whether the words "gross misconduct" covered the words "gross neglect of duty." Perhaps the difficulty would be got over satisfactorily by agreeing to the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that duties were of various kinds. The neglect of some would certainly be gross misconduct; but the neglect of others, which were of a trifling character, would not amount to gross misconduct, and it would be unjust to punish both equally. He thought that "gross misconduct" would cover "gross neglect of duty."

SIR HENRY JAMES believed everybody was agreed that neglect of duty ought to be punished, and therefore he did not see why the words should not be inserted, for the sake of clearness.

MR. NORWOOD contended that the clause as it stood was a perfectly correct clause, and did not at all clash with that which followed it.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK thought the case would be best met by inserting both phrases.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON suggested that the words to be inserted ought to be "such neglect of duty as should endanger the safety of the ship, passengers, or cargo."

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that the Mercantile Marine officers would not object to the clause being amended as proposed, providing they were satisfied as to the competency of the tribunal before whom they were to be tried.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he would accept the Amendment.

MR. RATHBONE hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to the clause as it stood. He thought the opinion of the Solicitor General was right, as the words "neglect of duty" might be misconstrued.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted.

MR. HAMOND moved, as an Amendment, in sub-section 1, line 1, after "complaint," to insert, "on behalf of the Board of Trade." The object was that complaints made before the Courts against any officer in the Mercantile Marine should be only made with the consent of the Board of Trade.

MR. MUNTZ trusted the Government would retain the clause in its present shape.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CHARLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 18, after "England" to insert "any local Court of Admiralty jurisdiction or." His object was to put the County Court Judge with Admiralty jurisdiction on the same footing as the stipendiary magistrate. In many parts there was no stipendiary magistrate; but there were County Court Judges with Admiralty jurisdiction all round the coast. The offences mentioned in this section were only quasi-criminal—as, for example, tyranny, and required a more delicate investigation than a Police Court could always secure to the accused.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted.

MR. T. E. SMITH moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 16, to insert after "magistrate" the words "or failing these, justices of the peace sitting in petty sessions." It was very desirable that there should be some local summary jurisdiction.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY objected to the Amendment. It would be unwise and inexpedient that shipowners should try shipping cases in which they were personally interested.

MR. FAWCETT observed that, if it was unfair and unwise for justices to act judicially in marine cases, it was equally unfair and unwise for them to act judicially in cases under the Game Laws.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. NORWOOD in moving, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 30, to leave out "an assessor or" and insert "two or more," said, that the present mode of trying questions affecting marine officers was not a popular one. As the clause now stood "an assessor or assessors" were to be appointed to assist the magistrate in such investigations, and he proposed to amend it by inserting that there should be "two or more" assessors.

MR. CHARLEY supported the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed it, observing that there were many cases in which a single assessor would be sufficient, while, if more than one were in every case required, it might be difficult in some cases not requiring them to find them. The sole object of these two clauses, in fact, was to take from the Board of Trade the duty of appointing assessors, which they proposed to transfer to the High Court of Admiralty. Such a high and independent authority he thought, might be safely charged with it. It also provided a more independent tribunal, for whose advice, but not co-operation, there should be this provision of assessors.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON thought that there would be no difficulty in finding plenty of assessors.

MR. GRIEVE agreed with the course proposed by the Government.

MR. MAC IVER supported the Amendment. Masters and officers of ships sometimes had the strongest reasons for finding fault with reference to the incompetency of the Courts which tried them, and the present clause would perpetuate their grievance.

MR. HERSCHELL inquired who was to determine whether there should be one or more assessors?

MR. GOURLEY hoped that the Amendment would be acceded to.

SIR ANDREW LUSK did not see the necessity for always having more than two assessors.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY explained that the Court itself would apply for such assessors as were required.

MR. NORWOOD said, that the questions to be determined upon these inquiries were of the most serious character, involving the character and future career in life, and every officer whose conduct was questioned would desire that there should be more than one assessor.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY observed that the present law was that the Board of Trade might appoint one or more assessors. No change on this point was proposed, but only a more independent choice of them.

MR. NORWOOD said, that the present state of the law was most unsatisfactory, and required serious attention.

Mr. Norwood

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY promised that the clause should be so far re-considered that when two or more were appointed one at least should be an expert in the merchant service.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE suggested that as it was now a quarter to 7 it would be advisable to report Progress rather than attempt to proceed further with the Bill at present.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY assented to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

NATIONAL DEBT (SINKING FUND)

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

POSTPONEMENT OF THIRD READING.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [18th June], "That the Bill be read the third time upon Monday next."

Question again proposed.

MR. FAWCETT moved, that instead of being put down for Monday after the Merchant Shipping Bill, it should not be taken until Tuesday. From accident the measure had not been fully discussed, and it had been put upon the Paper time after time without the slightest chance of its being reached.

MR. SPEAKER said, that as there was opposition, the Bill must, by the Standing Orders of the House, be upon the Paper for the Evening Sitting.

And it being now Seven of the clock, House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

STATE OF TURKEY—TREATY OF PARIS, 1856.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

MR. J. R. YORKE, in rising to call attention to the 9th clause of the Treaty of Paris of 1856, and to the condition of Turkey in so far as it bears on British interest; and to move an Address for—said, whatever charge might be brought against Parliament that Session it could not be said it had hitherto wasted much time on questions of foreign policy. There had been but two conversations on such questions in the course of the Session, one of which related to the Carlists; and he was encouraged in opening a third by a remark of the Prime Minister last Session, to the effect that he should not regret if the House occasionally diverted its mind from home questions by considering things which happened outside the boundaries of this country. The question which he wished to bring before the House that evening was one which he believed to be of immense importance not only to the interests of England but of Europe, and, if necessary, he could fortify himself with the authority of a long list of eminent names, from that of Chatham, who would not condescend to argue with a man who differed from him on this point, down to that of Lord Palmerston. Now, however, we were not content to rest upon authorities merely; and before he proceeded to show the state of the Turkish monarchy, he would give one or two reasons why he thought the independence and integrity of Turkey ought to be maintained. The Emperor Nicholas, in his celebrated conversation with Sir Hamilton Seymour, called Egypt our road to India; but he (Mr. Yorke) thought that in a truer sense Turkey might be called our road to India. We had in India 30,000,000 of subjects professing the Mahomedan faith, and for the most part they lived peaceably under our rule, being advised by their learned men that it was lawful and right to live in peace under the British Crown. With the exception of the Wahabees in the North-Western Provinces, it might be said that the Mahomedan population were peaceable, orderly, and quiet; and it was difficult to limit the extent to which this was owing to the long-established friendship between the head of their faith, the Sultan of Turkey, the vicar of the Prophet, and the Sovereign of England. At a recent meeting of Mahomedans at Calcutta, a speaker from European Turkey enjoined obedience to England, and it appeared from Lord Elgin's despatches that Tippoo Sahib, at the time he made war against England, received a letter from Sultan Selim, then Sultan of Turkey, in which that Monarch requested Tippoo to desist from offensive enterprizes against England, inasmuch as she was the ancient and trusted friend of Turkey. His second point was, What would happen supposing there were to be a collapse and a partition of Turkey? Would Egypt and Candia be any compensation to us, even supposing they were given to us, as proposed by the Emperor Nicholas, for what we should lose? Constantinople could not remain a free city; the experiment of free cities had been tried and had failed. Where were the free cities of Cracow, Lubek, Frankfort, and Hamburg? Each section of the inhabitants of Constantinople would contend for the supremacy. Servia, Roumania, and Greece would wish to extend their frontiers at the expense of Turkey; Russia would succeed in the end, and the consequence would be the further consolidarity between the three military Powers which remained now that the sun of France had been eclipsed. As the partition of Poland produced the Holy Alliance, so these three Powers would come together in any question which affected their pre-eminence. At present they had the power of regulating everything which happened on the Continent, tempered only by the maritime supremacy of England; and, if Constantinople were in the hands of one of these Powers, how long would that power of England remain? With the vast forests and mineral wealth of Turkey in the possession of Russia, with a harbour commanding the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, and with all the resources of civilization, how long would it be before our maritime supremacy came to an end? From Turkey and Russia we derived raw materials used in our manufactures. The basis of Turkish commerce was Free Trade; that of Russian commerce was Protection. In Turkey there were harbour dues and licence duties, but they were rendered necessary by financial embarrassment, and were not adopted on grounds of policy. If Russia and Turkey were under the same Government, and we had to depend upon them for supplies for our manufactures, and they had a high protective tariff over those manufactures which were sent into the country, the commercial position of England in the East would be seriously compromised. It was Turkey which enabled us to defeat the policy of Napoleon expressed in the Berlin decree. Our ascendancy in India, our maritime supremacy, and our interest in freedom of trade, therefore, constituted three strong reasons why we should defend the independence of Turkey. To pass, however, from material to moral considerations, Constantinople was the point of contact between Mahomedanism and Christianity, and Mahomedanism had more hold over its subjects than perhaps any other religion in the world. At present the best chance of Europeanizing and Christianizing the Turkish Provinces was to use the influence we could exercise through the Sultan; but if, with the Crescent and the Cross facing each other on opposite shores, Turkey passed into the hands of Russia, we should defer indefinitely the moral conquest we might otherwise achieve. His contention was that the integrity and independence of Turkey were seriously compromised by the present state of its finances. If the interest of Turkey was vital to us, so also must be its good government. He was sorry to say that the misgovernment of the country was flagrant, notorious, and even ruinous. The year 1854 was the first year in which Turkey learnt how to charge the future with the extravagance of the present. She had proved a very apt pupil, and between then and now she had borrowed in the European markets £150,000,000 sterling, two-thirds of which were held in England. Between 1854 and 1865 she borrowed in no one year more than £5,000,000, but in this case vires acquirit laudo, and in 1865 she began to increase her loans until last year she had borrowed £40,000,000, issued by the Ottoman Bank. Of course, these loans were issued at increasingly ruinous rates, the last being issued at 5 per cent and the price being 42. The annual interest on the debt was £15,000,000. It might be asked what they had to show for that vast sum of money. They had two railway systems, both enormously great in promises but hitherto very moderate in performances. There were two main railways which were not yet finished; in Asia, there had been many schemes, but nothing was yet completed, except a few score miles of railway. Vast sums had been spent in re-organizing the Army and building new ships, but it was difficult to say how far the men were paid now, or whether they would receive any money at all if war broke out, and it was doubtful if these services were much improved. Palaces and mosques had been built, but chiefly out of the Civil List, and the fact remained that the only reproductive expenditure was represented by a railway. He would give a short account of the financial prospects of the year. The income raised last year was under 21,000,000 lira. Three-fourths of the entire revenue went to pay the interest on the debt; only one quarter, or 5,000,000 lira, was left for administration. The estimated expenditure this year was 29,000,000 lira. The available revenue was 21,000,000 lira, and the nominal deficit 8,000,000 lira. But the Turks added to their estimate 5,000,000 lira, and hoped to reduce the deficit to 2,000,000 lira or 3,000,000 lira by two calculations—1st, by estimating a reduction of 2,000,000 lira last year by Asia Minor famine as temporary, although it was very doubtful if it could be reduced more than 1,000,000, and, second, by estimating three new taxes this year as likely to produce 3,000,000 lira. Those taxes were a stamp tax, a Constantinople property tax, estimated to produce 2,000,000 lira, and a patent tax. This estimate, he believed, was delusive. The taxes would not be paid. If they were, the deficit would be 3,000,000* lira. Taking the unrealized income at 2,250,000 lira—and this was a sanguine calculation—the normal deficit would be 5,000,000 lira at least. It was believed by those who were best informed on the matter that this deficit would amount to 11,000,000 lira. This was arrived at by estimating the expenditure at 29,000,000 lira. The items constituting the deficit were these—Normal deficit, 4,500,000 lira; excess of floating debt over the amount consolidated, 3,250,000 lira; Asia Minor famine relief and purchases of arms, 2,200,000 lira; and public works, 1,300,000 lira, making an approximate total deficit of 11,000,000 lira. For practical purposes the normal deficit was 5,000,000 lira. This had to be annually met by new consolidation loans on increasingly ruinous terms. It was reported by those who ought to know that there would be a deficiency on 20 out of 29 sources of revenue. He ventured to predict that the revenue would produce about 4,000,000 lira less than the estimate; but on the most favourable hypothesis the revenue would be 22,000,000 lira, and the annual charge for debt being 15,000,000 lira there would remain a balance of 7,000,000 lira to defray all Imperial charges, including Army, Navy, a huge Civil List, and the Civil Service of the whole Empire. What was the moral and political significance of this? The services of the country were so starved that only one-half per cent of the revenue could be afforded for educational requirements; only 2 per cent for the administration of justice—Judges, to whom the decision of questions involving large commercial interests was confided receiving a salary less than that of a clerk in the Common Pleas—it meant backshish and necessary corruption. With the permission of the House he would give an extract from the letter of a correspondent who was well acquainted with the state of Turkey, in which the course of justice and the Courts of Law were thus described—

“Courts of Law, too, markets, not open markets, but dirty back-door shops, closets for fraud, corners for chicane, and dens where professional brokers meet the judicial staff to job causes and rob suitors. We have 2,000 British vessels annually passing in these waters. We have enormous maritime interests at stake, and these are confided to a Court where the corruption of the Judges, their ignorance and greediness, reduce the proceedings to a farce, for which suitors pay and by which commerce is robbed. We have lately been obliged to break off all communication with the Maritime Tribunal at Constantinople on account of its notorious corruption, and to refuse to refer British interests to these sinks of iniquity.”

Such was the state of justice, the backbone of a nation's well-being, in Turkey. Could it be wondered that capital fled from it? There were great obstacles in the way of commercial and agricultural enterprise. The question suggested itself whether, under these circumstances, the revenue of Turkey could be increased. The country was replete with untapped wealth, for it was covered with virgin forests, and the soil abounded in the richest minerals, which only required capital to be made available; but at present agriculture was the only subject for taxation; therefore, to increase the revenue meant to increase the taxation of agriculture. But land was already burdened to the very margin of profitable cultivation. This burdensome taxation was aggravated by the mode of levying it. The chief tax on the land was the dime or tithe, which was taken in kind, and now stood not at 10 but 12½ per cent, and had been as high as 15 per cent. The cultivator had to convey the amount of the tax to the district dépôt, sometimes 15 miles away, at his own cost. The effect on agriculturists was exceedingly vexatious, and the general result of the system was simply to involve the whole country in misery and ruin. An illustration of the working of the system was afforded two years ago in the case of the famine caused by the want of rain in different parts. In other parts of the country plenty of rain fell, but there were no proper communications or other means whereby the condition of one district could be alleviated from the supplies which others could have afforded, and the result was that with rich harvests existing at no great distance from the famished districts, 150,000 lives were lost. The fact was that an easy acquiescence in corruption was the prevailing weakness of the Turkish character. The average duration of a Grand Vizier's term of office since the death of Ali Pasha was five months, and under such a system the Ministers thought it was the best way to take care of themselves. The Grand Vizier drew £30,000 a-year; the Finance Minister £15,000, and the Minister of Public Works £11,000. Considering the gross amount of money in the Exchequer such salaries could hardly be called moderate. And yet, although the condition of the country was so serious, he thought there were elements which, if rightly used, might bring about a restoration; but there was a previous question to be disposed of, and that was, What right had we to interfere in the internal affairs of Turkey, and if so, how far? He thought we had, because Turkey was a country in which we had a vast interest; moreover, we were vitally bound up with her future. We had also lent her £100,000,000 sterling, and on all these grounds we were entitled to step in before her ruin was complete. With regard to the loan advanced by English creditors, it might be said the argument of carcat emptor applied, that those who went in for a high interest got a bad security, and we ought not to trouble ourselves on the subject. Now, in January, 1848, Lord Palmerston addressed a Memorandum to Her Majesty's Representatives on the Continent, in which he said it was entirely a matter of discretion whether our Government should interfere on behalf of our foreign bondholders, and he declared that our right to interfere as far as International Law was concerned was indisputable. The same doctrine was held by statesmen on both sides of the House on the Motion of Lord George Bentinck in 1847. Surely, then, we had a right to tender advice to Turkey in a friendly spirit when we saw a national collapse threatening her. He would further quote a despatch of Lord Russell's forwarded in 1862. The despatch was a telegram, and the words were—"I insist on instant transmission of the payment of the interest on the loan of 1858." If this was not intervention, what was? He did not commend the style of the communication to the present Foreign Minister, for it was somewhat too tart and concise, even though it assumed a telegraphic form, and had the additional merit of being far less prolix than some the House had heard of. But, further, we had spent £100,000,000 and sacrificed thousands of lives in the Crimean War, and were therefore entitled to see that we had got something in return for them. The real objects of that war were to take away from Russia the pretext for single-handed interference which she claimed to exercise in virtue of the Treaty of Kaynardji, and to introduce into the organization of Turkey, if possible, the humanizing influences of European civilization. Those objects were provided for by the 9th Article of the Treaty of Paris, in which allusion was made to the Khathy-Humâioun which, though not embodied in the Treaty, was published shortly before and was communicated in the most solemn manner by the Sultan to the Representatives of the great Powers. It amounted to a solemn engagement on the part of the Sultan that certain reforms should be carried out. It was an extension of the Hatt-y-Scheriff of Gulhané, dated 1839, which contained 35 Articles, and promised, among other things, religious equality as between Christians and Mahomedans. Persecution was foreign to the nature of the Turk. He was a fanatic, but not a persecutor; and the cases of injury to Christian subjects which occurred were largely attributable directly or indirectly to the weakness of the central authority and the independence of the Pashas. The second part of the Hatt-y-Scheriff of Gulhané promised a codification of the law, mixed tribunals, the construction of railways, roads, and canals, and the establishment of banks to develop the resources of the country. Instead, however, of these improvements having been actually effected, they had still mock Courts, unpaid Judges, arbitrary procedure, and corrupt decisions. No step had been taken to admit Christians and Mahomedans on equal terms to the Army as had been promised. Multitudes died in Asia Minor for want of a road; and the chief achievement in making railways was the line from Constantinople to Adrianople that had given rise to a scandal of which most of them had heard. When Lord Lyons remonstrated with Fuad Pasha on the non-fulfilment of the Khathy-Humâioun, the Pasha issued a circular, dated July 1867, in reply, which was sent to all the Great Powers, and in which he described the difficulties with which the Turkish Government had to contend with, and asserted that she had done as much in the way of reform as could fairly have been expected from her in the time she had had for the purpose. Fuad Pasha died next year, and incapacity and corruption again prevailed. All the other Powers were continually meddling in Turkey. They all had Representatives on the spot, who mixed themselves up with petty commercial jobs, more or less, and each of them used its power to further the interests of its own country. The more patriotic Turks invited our interposition, and asked why of all nations England, their ancient friend and ally, interfered so little. He now came to the grounds of hope for Turkey. She had had very bad times. She had an unfortunate war with Russia in 1829; her fleets were destroyed by the maritime Powers at Navarino; the Kingdom of Greece was carved out of her dominions; her Janissaries were destroyed; Albania, her chief recruiting ground, was in revolt; and in Egypt Mehemet Ali threatened her very existence. Under those circumstances there must have been unusual vitality in an Empire that could survive such extraordinary disasters. Turkey had a vast reserve of wealth in mines, timber, and cultivable land. It was estimated that only one-half of her cultivable land was under cultivation, and that its produce was capable under proper management of being multiplied four-fold. It was remarkable how quickly things recovered themselves in districts where there was anything like good administration. Mehemet Redschid Pasha, Midad Pasha, Governor of Vilayet of the Danube, and Ahmed Vefyk Effendi, at Broussa, were distinguished men, who had done much to remedy the evils they found in their respective provinces. These individuals were all alive and well, as were other able and honest men whom the Government would not employ. In Eastern countries, he might remark, society was far more homogeneous than it was in Western countries. In the former there had been no relaxation of the feudal system, and there were none of the numerous industrial and commercial questions which were continually cropping up in the West of Europe. If the Governor were changed it would be found that the whole landscape of the country around him would be altered also. It was this circumstance which made him hopeful of the future of Turkey, if diplomatic remonstrances could be addressed to her in such a manner as to be effectual. But as long as the Sultan's will and caprice were the only laws there would be no reliable improvement. At present the sinister influence of Russia, backed by Austria, was the only one brought to bear on him. The Sultan had possessed unlimited power since the reforms introduced by Mahmoud. There were limits on the power of the Czar of Russia and the Shah of Persia, but the power of the Sultan was practically absolute. The Sultan's power had not, however, been always unlimited. Before Sultan Mahmoud's time, the Janissaries, a kind of Pretorian Guard, themselves checked by the Albanians, often became the armed organs of public opinion, but their turbulence finally made them odious, and when Mahmoud appealed to the people against them they were massacred by a rising en masse. The second limitation to the Sultan's power in former days was the Derebeys, or great provincial Pashas, who were feudal chiefs supported by armed retainers. These Derebeys were as independent as the Percies and Norfolks of our own early history, and the Sultan's writ ran in the provinces only so far as they chose to permit it. But they were destroyed by Sultan Mahmoud and his Grand Vizier, the Louis XIII. and Richelieu of Turkey, who introduced the Tanzimat, or new organization, substituting the Nizzam, a regular force of the Albanians. The people got wearied of the local magnates, and their armed force supported the Sultan as their liberator. However, by not erecting a National Divan as a check on the absolute power of the Sultan, they missed their opportunity and were now "chastised with scorpions." Ali Fuad, a real statesman, who had an instinct for the situation, saw the need of a check on the despotism of their master, and deliberately invoked it in the form of foreign interference, especially of England and of France, as far as France followed England. They were not jealous of the great personal influence of Lord Stratford, but counted it as a support to the reforms which they could not have carried out. This third limitation to the Sultan's power had now disappeared. The events of the Crimean War, coupled with French diplomatic audacity, substituted French for English influence. The influence of France became odious in consequence of its arrogance and its employment, not for the good of Turkey, but to advance petty French commercial interests. Then came the German War of 1870, and the Turks gladly seized the opportunity of throwing off the French influence. Unluckily, England missed her opportunity. Then came Prince Gortchakoff's despatch. The Black Sea Treaty was contemptuously torn up by Russia and thrown in our faces, and as a consequence Russian influence became paramount. The truth was, that diplomatic influence, as understood by Fuad Pasha and exercised by Lord Stratford, had ceased to exist. General Ignatieff was now supreme. His influence, founded on fear, was backed by Austria, and was exercised for evil. The Turks perfectly understood General Ignatieff's policy, which was to weaken them by every means in his power. He supported all the vassals against their Suzerain, picked quarrels through consuls, with local governors, was intimate with the Sultan, whom he supported in his despotic acts, and he might, indeed, be described as the Mephistophiles of Turkey. The German Ambassador, Baron Werther, was General Ignatieff's shadow, it being the policy of Germany to conciliate Russia in order to get her support in the West. Austria again had abandoned independent action, because her crippled condition prevented her from taking any unless she was supported by England. All she did now was to develop her commerce with the vassal States and Roumelia, for which she had to bargain with Russia, who, of course, demanded reciprocal advantages. Her commercial necessities had become Russia's political opportunities. The commercial treaties with Roumania and the diplomatic action of the three Powers in the matter of Baron Hirsch's railways resulted from this solidarity between the three Powers. The only country which counted for nothing at present was England. She certainly kept out of diplomatic intrigues and scandals, but she also had to forego the higher duty of remonstrance and advice on the general good and bad governments of the country which Lord Stratford discharged with such effect. England had abandoned her old programme, and the Turk looked in vain for his accustomed friend at Pera. He would now say something about the personal character of the present Sultan of Turkey. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey), who visited Constantinople last year, wrote as follows:—

"The authorized Civil List of the Sultan is about £1,200,000, and by means of various more or less arbitrary grants it is actually little short of £2,000,000 a-year. All along the shores of the Bosphorus vast palaces and elaborate kiosks occur in succession at a distance of a little more than a mile apart. Some of these buildings are furnished in the most costly style. The daily dinner of the Sultan—he always dines alone—consists of 94 dishes, and 19 other meals are prepared in case it should be his fancy to partake of them. He has 800 horses, 700 wives, attended and guarded by 350 eunuchs. For this enormous household 40,000 oxen are yearly slaughtered, and the purveyors are required to furnish daily 200 sheep, 100 lambs or goats, 10 calves, 200 hens, 200 pairs of pullets, 100 pairs of pigeons, and 50 green geese."

The people of Constantinople were quite aware of their Monarch's failings, and did not extenuate them in conversation among themselves. In fact, the Government of Turkey might be described as despotism "tempered by defamation of the despot." Scandals were constantly circulated respecting the corruption of the Court, and the Sultan was said to have accumulated vast wealth, among other ways, by occasionally receiving large sums of money from contractors. He now came to the practical part of the question, which was as to how we should conduct diplomatic intervention on the lines of the Khaty Humâioun. We had recently interfered, when Sir Henry Elliott remonstrated against the removal of a patriotic Minister. England could not afford to let Turkey alone. Our interests were too deeply bound up with hers for us to let her sink without, at any rate, making an effort that we alone could make effectually to save her, and he hoped therefore the British Government would make that effort. Next to England, the Turks valued France most highly, though France had in the course of her history done Turkey some bad turns. If we were to take no steps for that purpose it was not difficult to foresee in what manner the final collapse would come. There was a whole group of minor difficulties, some of which were constantly arising, such as the Montenegrin-Podgoritzza affair, the Roumanian Treaty of Commerce, and the Servian question, all of which were ready to be manipulated at any moment by designing persons, and converted into questions of first-rate importance, and in reference to which Turkey might be driven into a corner; then a military demonstration might be made by some Continental Powers, England would remonstrate as uselessly as she did at the time of the war with Denmark, and, war being declared, the beginning of the end would come. He asked Her Majesty's Government whether they would allow this undesirable consummation to come about without making a fair struggle against it? Were he addressing the Government of Lord

Mr. J. R. Yorke

Russell or that of the late Ministry, he should not have much hope in the matter; but he believed that the Conservative Government held the opinion that England had stood aloof long enough from the councils of Europe. As a possible arbitrator of peace or war between other Powers, we must take a more active part than we had of late in the councils of Europe, and it was therefore with much misgiving, but not without some hope, that he concluded by asking the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to lay the Papers referred to in his Motion upon the Table of the House, which Papers, he trusted, would show that the question he had brought forward had not been altogether overlooked by our successive Governments, and that hereafter a determined and decided position would be taken up by our diplomatic agents, so as to restore to England some portion, at all events, of her ancient prestige. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Address of which he had given Notice.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that after the able and comprehensive speech of the hon. Member, and seeing that so many hon. Members were anxious to speak upon the subject, he should not trespass upon the attention of the House for any great length of time. He begged to second the Motion of the hon. Member in the same spirit in which the subject had been introduced by the hon. Member—a spirit that was in no way hostile to Turkey, and was not induced by any anxiety to show up the shortcomings and deficiencies of that country, but which, on the contrary, had for its object the strengthening and the maintenance of that kingdom. He believed that the object would be best attained by bringing this most important question before the country, and by obtaining from that House an expression of opinion with regard to it. It was impossible to deny that our influence in Turkey had greatly diminished within the last few years. That fact, however, was no reflection upon the merits of the distinguished gentlemen who had filled the post of English Ambassador at Constantinople since the days of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. Since the death of Fuad Pasha and of Ali Pasha, who were both singularly advanced in their notions, Turkey had greatly deteriorated, and with that deterioration our influence had equally deteriorated. The hon. Member, therefore, had done well in calling the attention of the House and of the country to the false position in which we might before long be placed with reference not only to that country, but with regard also to Russia. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to a letter which had been written in 1869 by Fuad Pasha, shortly before his death, to the Sultan. That letter was as follows—

“When this writing shall be placed under your Majesty’s eyes I shall no longer be of this world. On this occasion, therefore, you may listen to me without mistrust; the voice from the tomb is always sincere. . . . God has intrusted you with a mission as glorious as it is full of perils. In order to accomplish it worthily your Majesty must endeavour fully to realise one great and painful truth—the Empire of the Osmanli is in danger. . . . Among our foreign allies you will find England always in the first rank. Her policy and her friendship are as firm as her institutions. She has rendered us immense services, and it would be impossible to calculate those she may render us in the future. Whatever happens, the English people, the most steadfast and the most wonderful in the world, will be the first and best of our allies. I would rather lose several Provinces than see the Sublime Porte abandoned by England. . . . I come at last to Russia—that inveterate enemy of our nation. The extension of that power towards the East is a fatal law of the Muscovite destiny. If I had been myself a Russian Minister I would have overturned the world to conquer Constantinople.”

When it was remembered that that letter was written in 1869, and what the condition of Turkey was now, it was marvellous to see how great her deterioration had been in that short period. What was the present financial position of that country? Her revenue was £18,000,000 per annum, while the interest upon her debt amounted to £15,000,000, and the expenses of the Sultan’s establishment were £2,000,000, which left only £1,000,000 for the support of her Army, her Navy, and her Civil Service. The result was that loans were heaped upon loans, and the interest upon the old debt was paid out of fresh loans. That was certainly not a sound state of things. Contrasted with Turkey, how did Egypt stand? Why, under two of the most enlightened men of the day, the present Viceroy and Nubar Pasha, that country had within 10 years doubled her revenue, and, although £52,000,000 had been raised by loans, every penny of the money had been expended on roads, railroads, the Suez Canal, and other public improvements. The reason of this difference between the two countries was that Egypt was not governed as Turkey was, by foreign influence. It was Russia who introduced the Note, in which Lord Stanley so wisely refused to join, ceding Crete to Greece. For different reasons from those by which Russia was animated, he approved that step only because it tended to strengthen the Christian element, while the artichoke policy of Russia was to weaken Turkey bit by bit until nothing was left of her but the heart of the artichoke, which Russia could then readily swallow. With regard to the existing relations of Russia with Turkey, the policy of Russia was to establish ports for her own advantage, and which she could herself control. He did not advocate any undue interference in the matter; but, at any rate, the opinion of England ought to be expressed so that the whole world might know what was going on. It was said that under the obligations of the Treaty we could not interfere; but Lord Stratford de Redcliffe had printed a letter upon the subject, in which he entirely denied that interpretation, and said that this country was not precluded from interfering in favour of the Treaty of Paris being carried out. The state of Turkey at the present time had been alluded to. What that state of things was would be found in the official Reports of our Consuls, which it would be well for the House to study. Mr. Consul Palgrave said—

"Capital has vanished from the land. Every undertaking, commercial, industrial, or agricultural, is smitten with failure. The social condition is deteriorating in every respect, the number of the inhabitants diminishing, and the symptoms precursive of a general bankruptcy, not of means and finances only, but of vitality and of men, becoming more menacing year by year, almost day by day."

The Levant Herald said—

"There is no capital in the country, consequently no enterprise, no spread of ideas, no real national vitality. . . . Continue the present system, and it is impossible to predict how soon there may be a general and hopeless collapse."

And, again, Mr. Locock, Attaché to the British Embassy at Constantinople, in a recent Report, said—

"There are many and serious evils affecting not only British merchants, but, one way or another, all British residents in this country."

Sir Bartle Frere, on the other hand, speaking of Egypt, said—

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

"There is one Eastern Power to which the eyes of all friends of Africa turn with hopefulness. Egypt has been the great centre of African civilization. Under the present dynasty, of the enormous increase of the aggregate wealth of the country there can be no doubt."

If Egypt had made such progress, why should not Turkey also materially advance? He could only say that they had already made great sacrifices, both of money and blood, in her behalf; and, in his opinion, by those sacrifices of the past, in the interests of the present, and for the hopes of the future we ought to endeavour to do something to remedy the existing state of things in Turkey.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Correspondence between the Foreign Office and the Sublime Porte relating to the non-fulfilment of the provisions of the Khathy Humaioun by the Government of the Sultan between 1856 and the present time; and, of Circular Memorandum of Fuad Pasha, dated July 1867, to the representatives of the Porte at the different Courts of Europe on the progress of the fulfilment of the engagement of the Khathy Humaioun,"—(Mr. Reginald Forke.)—instead thereof.

LORD FRANCIS CONYNNGHAM said, that young and inexperienced as he was, he should probably not have troubled the House upon the subject, for the old Eastern saying—"Speech is silver, but silence is golden," had always been his favourite motto; but having recently returned from Constantinople, to which capital he had proceeded upon a mission deeply interesting to all Christians at home, having reference to a subject of religious difficulty, he might be permitted to say a few words upon it. The mission had for its object the presentation to His Majesty the Sultan of a memorial numerously and most influentially signed by Members of that and the other House of Parliament, among the latter Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, by the Archbishops and many of the Bishops, and by the Lord Mayors and Mayors of most of our cities and towns. The memorial was intended to call the attention of His Majesty to cases of religious persecution which had occurred in direct violation of the Hatt-Scheriff issued in 1856, and there was nothing in the memorial which could offend the susceptibilities of the most sensitive Moslems. It set forth the case of certain Ansairyeh subjects of His Majesty, whose religion, previous to their conversion to Christianity, was somewhat of a homogeneous character, as it contained the Sabeanism of the Chaldeans, the Fire worship of the Persians, and the old Baal worship of the Canaanites, and who had acted as teachers in Christian schools. No fault could be found with them as subjects of the Ottoman Empire, and yet after the death of Fuad Pasha and Ali Pasha they were subjected to persecution and even to banishment, the latter on the plea—a plea which he found to be without foundation—of protecting them from the fanaticism of the people. Cases of persecution inflicted upon Christians were also set forth, and it was hoped that the wrongs of those unhappy people would be redressed. The members of the mission were, however, informed that they could not be received by His Majesty, because they had not any known official character, and that it was not customary to receive a non-official deputation. That, however, was not a well-founded plea, as Sir Moses Montefiore on one occasion had an interview with the Sultan upon a question of Jewish persecution. There was only one course left for the deputation to pursue, and that was one which would have been derogatory to a mission which contained Members of both Houses of Parliament among its number. They might have presented their memorial, but they must have done so like the Mahomedans. They must have stood in the streets as the Sultan went to the mosque, and by that means alone could they have got their memorial into His Majesty's hands. The greatest interest was shown by Christians of all denominations in the success of the mission, and the Roman Catholic Bishop of Constantinople bitterly complained of the persecutions which some of his flock had suffered at the hands of the Mahomedan authorities. He did not complain so much of the Mahomedan population as of the Maho-

“ authorities, because in the days of Pasha there were none of these
 as. The deputation finally came to the conclusion that they had better leave the address with Her Majesty's Ambassador and return home. Having served in His Majesty's Navy in the East in 1851, and during the Crimean War, he knew something of Turkey, and when he visited Constantinople last February, he became sadly aware how great had been the change since the time when this country was represented by Sir Stratford Canning, now Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. The Turks had a saying that if a Turk became a Christian it was desirable to cut off his head at once, because if once “the great Eltchi,” as Sir Stratford was called, came to know it, he would not allow it to be done. He did not blame this or that Minister, and it was difficult to state how it had happened, but the influence of England was at present at its lowest ebb in Turkey. He was asked by people of all classes “What is England doing?” and he was assured that if she went on in her present course her legitimate influence with Turkey would soon become a name and a recollection of the past. After the great sacrifices she had made to maintain the Turkish Empire, she ought to insist upon the Christians being exempted from persecutions, and receiving the protection they were justly entitled to.

MR. BAXTER said, that for many years past he had felt that our relations with the Ottoman Empire were exceedingly unsatisfactory, and without going back to the Crimean War or tracing the policy or the projects of Russia, he thought that the present social and political position of Turkey ought to be better known to the British public. His acquaintance with that country began in earlier life, and, as he had just returned from a six months' visit to the Levant, perhaps the House would allow him to describe in simple language what he saw and heard. He was not an advocate of any particular policy in the East, but the deplorable condition of things in Turkey was so profoundly impressed upon his mind that, although he had not taken part in a foreign debate in that House for many years, he felt it his duty to say a few words on the present occasion. When he had formerly been in the East—and he had been there several times—there had always been among the foreign residents, and especially among the British, a very strong "Turkish party," who believed in the resurrection of Turkey, who thought that new life had been infused into it, and that the signs of decadence had passed away. He was bound to tell the House that he met on this occasion with no such party at all. On the contrary, every man he met, native or foreign—British, French, German, or American—mercantile men, officials of the respective foreign Governments, and missionaries, were all agreed that things had come to such a pass that a break-up was inevitable. The subject was uppermost in men's thoughts, and they were all told that the misgovernment, oppression, venality, and corruption of the oppressed Turkish Empire were so great as to fill men's minds with apprehension and alarm. But more than that, he had met with men in high office—Pashas of high rank and others—who, not only in private, but in public conveyances, spoke in the most open manner, and without hesitation of the approaching break up of the Turkish Empire. There were still many people who believed in the stability of Ottoman rule, and, he was sorry to say, there were other people who had invested their money in Turkish bonds. Now, there were some things which these persons ought to know. He had inquired whether it was true that no Turkish Minister of State either past or present had ever invested his money in Turkish bonds. It was commonly reported that these dignitaries were just as well aware as other people of the impending catastrophe, and that at this moment they were engaged in the very pleasant process of feathering their own nests. He had heard of Pashas presiding over large districts who could not speak a word of Arabic. They could only speak Turkish, and they were unapproachable by the people, except by means of large bribes. It was notorious that Pashas who governed districts for only a year or two, and some even only for a few months, returned to Constantinople very rich men. It would be well therefore if those who invested their money in Turkish bonds on the faith of promises that the money would be spent in developing the resources of Turkey would just inquire a little into the manner in which those promises had been fulfilled. The hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. Yorke) had given the House much valuable information on the subject; but one of the principal statements made by the promoters of these loans was that Turkey required the money for roads. Well, how much of these loans had been spent on roads? He doubted whether Turkey had a single road except that between Beyrout and Damascus, and that had been made and sustained by the French Government. Nothing whatever had been done, as they had been led to expect would be, to facilitate commerce. The Civil List was not only extravagant, but there was no check upon it whatever; and all the money collected out of the pockets of the people of this country on the plea of developing the resources of Turkey had been spent in useless palaces, upon useless officials, in adding to harems and building that fleet of iron-clads which were of no use whatever in propping up a tottering and decaying Empire. During the late famine in Asia Minor thousands of people had perished, not because there was no food, but because there were no roads to transport the provisions sent by benevolent people in Europe to the starving population of Asia Minor. It was even asserted that a quantity of that food had been actually sold by the local Turkish Governments. Remarking upon an excellent pamphlet which had been published on the condition of things in Turkey, The Times used the following language:—

"We find here clearly indicated the reasons for the perfect paralysis and helplessness of the country—namely, an ill-informed Government, an untrustworthy executive, a peasantry without capital or credit, overtaxed and subject to extortion alike of the local authorities and the usurers—the want of a middle-class and the destruction of manufacture by the suicidal policy of the Porte, and their arbitrary treatment of trade. Add to this the want of roads and the utter inability of the peasant to make his cries heard either for justice or pity, and we need seek no further for explanation of the dire misery which is covering Asia Minor as with a dark garment. The whole evidence of this transaction, we regret to say, leads to the conclusion that neither justice, nor generosity, nor humanity regulates the conduct of the ordinary Turkish official."

All this, in this opinion, pointed directly to national bankruptcy; and he could not understand how any one could rise from a perusal of the correspondence with regard to the Turkish Loans of 1858 and 1862 without coming to the conclusion that such a catastrophe could not long be avoided. It was not, however, the business of the Foreign Office to interfere in these matters; the remedy was not complaining to the Foreign Office, but withholding more money. Quotations had been made from Earl Russell and Lord Palmerston involving a policy which he hoped had been abandoned by this country, and he would supplement these quotations by one from a despatch written by the present Lord Hammond on the 26th of April, 1871. He said—

“Her Majesty’s Government are in no way party to private loan transactions with foreign States. Contracts of this nature rests only between the Power borrowing and the capitalists who enter into them as speculative enterprises, and who are content to undertake extraordinary risks in the hope of large contingent profits. Further, it is scarcely necessary to point out the endless troubles which certainly would arise if the active intervention of England were exerted to redress the grievances of bondholders. Independently of the expense which would necessarily be incurred, and the risk of international complications, forcible measures, if adopted towards small States, which for the most part are the ones complained of, would subject this country to grievous imputations. For such and other obvious reasons, Her Majesty’s Government have determined, as a matter of wise policy, to abstain from taking up, as international questions, the complaints of British subjects against Foreign States which fail to make good their engagements in regard to such pecuniary transactions, or to interpose, except by good offices, between bondholders and the States by which they may be wronged.”

He hoped that extract, which met with his (Mr. Baxter’s) entire approval, and which he should be glad to see sent to every holder of foreign bonds, would be endorsed on the part of the Government. Everything he saw and heard in the Turkish Empire left a melancholy impression upon his mind, on account of the universal deadness that prevailed; land was going out of cultivation; taxes were oppressive, ridiculous in amount, and made more galling by the violence with which they were collected; the population was falling off in once fertile districts; crimes of violence were increasing, and murders were committed in the large towns, and were passed over not only without the discovery of the perpetrators, but without investigation. It was only the other day we read in the newspapers of an attempt to murder in the streets of Damascus our able Representative Mr. Green, whose merits, he hoped, would be recognized by promotion, and although the ruffian was well known, no action was taken until strong representations had been made in the matter by all the Consuls, in the course of a deputation to the Governor. That was but a sample of what was going on all over the Empire. In Syria he spent two months, and he did not meet a man who did not voluntarily express an earnest hope for a change of Government. All deprecated and deplored in the strongest manner the action of Great Britain in 1840 in driving out Ibrahim Pasha, and so detested was the Turkish Government in Syria, that the people would be glad to be annexed, in preference, to Egypt or any other Power; and the Syrians in Turkey were looking for a Confederation on the Danube or anywhere else or anything which could save them from the oppression and corruption that prevailed in Turkey. He should be glad if Great Britain could do anything, but he could not see that energetic diplomatic action would make things better, and yet nothing could be worse than their present condition. As to the oppression of Christians, the universal testimony of every one he met was that the old spirit of Mussulman fanaticism had risen once more, and had risen just in proportion as the Mussulmans felt they were about to lose, and to lose for ever, their dominion in Europe. Many persons said to him that they expected before long to see a renewal of such massacres as disgraced Damascus; and every person he met expressed a fervent and ardent hope that whatever complications arose, whatever steps were taken, nothing would be done by Great Britain to prop up a Power which had been guilty of such dereliction of duty.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the Khathy Humâioun of 1856 partook of a European character; it was formally communicated to the Powers and solemnly recorded in a Treaty, and it was designed, according to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to secure liberty of conscience, security of personal property, and the development of the resources of Turkey. It was all that remained to us of what was achieved by the Crimean War; and we were, therefore, justified in discussing the provisions and the success of a law which cost us so much blood and treasure. He thought, however, as far as the interests of this country were concerned, looking at the matter in a selfish point of view, what she had to consider most was the safety of her own possessions in India, especially the Euphrates Valley. Of the 14 races in Turkey, nine were Christian, and no one of those would like to see the other dominant. In 1854, Lord Palmerston, who had been considered the first authority on this subject, endorsing an opinion confidently expressed by Mr. Palgrave, said that, however much they might wish that those vast and fertile regions should be ruled over by a Christian Government, the Mahomedan race was the only one that could keep the country together. It had always been the misfortune of Turkey that she undertook more than she was able to perform, and now that councils had been established to assist, the Pachas endeavoured to shift their responsibility upon the councils. Fuad Pacha, however, in 1867, talked of various reforms which had been effected, and to these might be added a law as to colonies, and the right of foreigners to hold land; and altogether the catalogue of improvements attempted by Turkey had not been a small one. In the first place her Army and Navy had been much improved; and although this might have impoverished the country, yet it must be borne in mind that by the Treaty of Paris, Turkey had been to a great extent thrown upon her own resources to support herself against her great enemy Russia. The revenue had increased from £2,712,000 in 1860 to £19,500,000 in 1873, and if a proper administration were established in the provinces and the finances put into good order, and if honesty were enforced in the Central Bureau at Constantinople a revenue of £27,000,000 might be very easily raised. Trade, too, had of late greatly increased in Turkey. In 1859 the imports were valued at £2,813,000. In 1873 they rose to £6,068,000. The exports in 1859 were £4,680,000, and in 1873 £8,120,000. On the other hand, there was something very sad in the state of the accounts, for she was ground down by a taxation of from 30 to 40 per cent. She suffered from a deficiency of good roads, from a bad administration, and from the famine in Asia Minor. An hon. Gentleman had moreover stated she had to endure an increasing load of debt. That, no doubt, was so, but still Turkey had never done what Italy or Austria had done. She had never imposed an income tax upon the interest of her foreign loans. She had never repudiated her liabilities, but had on the contrary made every honest effort to meet her liabilities. In 1862 this country sent out financial agents to Turkey to instruct her how to borrow, and when the Government sent out an agent like Captain Tyler to teach her how to spend the money she had raised, they had to listen to complaints on both sides of the House. We had, he thought, taught her a bad system of finance, for such he considered a system of loans founded upon the hypothecation of particular revenues. All such loans ought to be raised on the faith of the country itself. What was to be the remedy? Isolated laws would not cure the evils which existed, so long as there was no one to administer them properly. What was wanted was good local government, irrigation, and commercial enterprise, assisted by foreign capital, looking only for ordinary mercantile return, and not for Government guarantees. What was really required was the reform of that centralization at Constantinople from which emanated the whole of the administration of the country. Turkey had no public opinion like Russia, and Constantinople had no press like Moscow. Therefore, it was impossible to permeate the provinces with opinions from the capital, whilst, at the same time, the provinces could not influence the capital. No one could report against the local officials but the Consuls, and they acted principally from the interests of their own countries or from some personal jealousy. He happened for some time to see a great deal of Fuad Pacha, and he said that one of the great evils of Constantinople arose from the wives of the great functionaries being immured in the harems, so that there was no society there. Another of the great evils in connection with affairs in Turkey was the wretched constitution of the Consular tribunals, and although he did not wish to reflect in any way upon the memory of that noble Lord, he thought that that constitution inaugurated by Lord Clarendon and adopted by the Governments of other nations, had done a great deal of harm to Turkey and to the countries which traded with Turkey. The capitulations of 1675 laid it down that if any dispute happened to arise among English subjects, the decision thereof should be left to their Ambassador or Consul without the Judge or other Governor interfering. But that was intended to apply only to a small number of the English themselves living at Constantinople, and the erection of a tribunal with such powers as were now claimed was never contemplated. He recollected one day walking down the Grande Rue at Pera, when he was attacked by an English sailor. Nobody would interfere, and he had to take such measures as he thought proper in his own defence. At Galata, again, there were gambling houses under Dutch protection, for there were no fewer than 16 protections, jurisdictions, and systems of police at Constantinople, and these had to do only with their own co-nationalists. When it was found that these houses were under Dutch protection, the Dutch Consul was applied to; but the owners said that they had made them over to the Portuguese, and the Portuguese in their turn had a similar story to tell, and so these gambling houses could not be got at. We ought to make some allowance for the difficulties of a country which had 14 races, 19 religious sects, and 16 or 17 jurisdictions. The refusal of the Sultan to receive the English Mission was a token of our diminished influence. That Mission had been invited by one Turkish Minister to go out; but by the time they arrived, another Minister was in power, who refused to allow them to see the Sultan. For some years we had looked upon our Ambassadors as merely the needles of a telegraph to be worked by somebody in London, and therefore they had lost their influence. In 1864 one of the Resolutions of the House of Commons affirmed to a great extent the principle of non-intervention. From that time our Ambassadors had been regarded as mere agents, and forbidden to exercise any personal influence but it was personal influence which was important. Let hon. Gentlemen only call to mind the influence which M. Van de Weyer possessed when he was Belgian Minister in London; and Baron Solvyns, who was now here, when at Constantinople exercised an influence superior to that of the British Ambassador. But the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had recently assumed in European politics an attitude worthy of the country, and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) trusted the noble Lord might pursue the same policy at Constantinople, enter upon a salutary course of advice and assistance, and restore to us the name we once held on the Bosphorus of being the true, faithful, and impartial friend of Turkey, and of all her various nationalities.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, the question of religious persecution in Turkey was much more germane to the subject brought before the House that evening than might at first sight appear. Among the few things to be gleaned from the debate, one was the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), that the growth of fanaticism in the Ottoman Empire was one of the most remarkable features of the day, as evincing its weakness. He (Mr. Ashley) quite coincided with that view, and he maintained that if Her Majesty's Government failed in pressing on Constantinople the evils of religious persecution, they would not only fail in the traditional policy of the country, but do a great disservice to Turkey herself. The House had heard that the abuses that prevailed everywhere in Turkey were due to the weakness of the central powers and the want of control over distant Pachas. He believed that to be the fact. If that was allowed to be pleaded as an excuse for acts of fanaticism, it would also be used to meet any pressure put upon the central authority for the promotion of the other reforms promised in the Khathy Humâioun. With reference to the question whether we were prevented by an Article in the Treaty of Paris from interfering in these matters, he would quote an authority which would be conclusive. In the debate in that House on the Peace of 1856, Lord Palmerston said—

“It is said that that which the Sultan gives to-day he may revoke to-morrow, and that the treaty does not give to the Allied Powers that right of interference which some hon. Members think necessary for the security of the Christian subjects of the Sultan. . . . The Sultan, however, was perfectly willing to give to the Allies that sort of moral right which I think ought to be considered a sufficient security for the maintenance of the arrangements which were made, and which in themselves were satisfactory. . . . For some time to come cases will arise in which the firman will not be fully executed by the authorities of the Porte in distant provinces and in places not immediately under the view of the consuls; and if that should occur, the fact of the firman having been adverted to in the treaty and the issuing of it having been recorded in the treaty, would give to the Allied Powers that moral right of diplomatic interference and of remonstrance with the Sultan, which I am perfectly convinced would be sufficient to accomplish the desired purpose. . . . But at the same time the transactions which have taken place at Paris and the stipulations contained in this treaty will give to all the Powers the right of watching whether the firman is carried into effect, and of remonstrance in case of violation of it; and I am convinced that this right will, in course of time, cause the firman not only to be looked upon as law, but to be carried into practice throughout the Turkish Empire."—[3 Hannard, cxlii. 124-5-6.]

There could be no doubt, then, that the Treaty gave us the right of exercising such a moral pressure on the Turkish Government as would be sufficient for the purpose, and yet the Foreign Secretary declined to interfere for the presentation of the memorial of the deputation at Constantinople. He hoped the Government for the future would not fail to give effect to the policy indicated by Lord Palmerston in the extract he had read.

MR. W. C. CARTWRIGHT said, that, carefully as he had listened to the debate, he had not heard anyone state what the British interests in Turkey were. He thought it was essential that some attempt should be made to define those interests. For himself, he fancied that our interests were confined to this point—that Turkey should show that she preserved within herself those elements of stability which would enable her to maintain its national independence. He felt bound regretfully to say that the condemnatory terms in which Turkish rule had been spoken of to-night were mainly borne out by fact. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose had told them what he had seen in his late visit, and his (Mr. Cartwright's) own recollections, though his experience was not so recent, confirmed all he had said to a melancholy degree. It could not be said that an Empire that witnessed the brawl which took place at Montenegro could be in any other than a precarious condition. That opinion was borne out by the testimony of men most experienced as to the condition of Turkey—men who were living in that country long enough to be unmoved by the expression of any sentimental grievance, and whose position entitled their testimony to credit. Three Consuls had reported on the condition of the people in the regions which they respectively represented. The Consul of Beyrout, an experienced officer, said the peasantry were oppressed alike by the wealthy of their own people and the officials of the Government. The poverty of the peasant rendered it impossible to seek protection from the proper tribunals owing to the great distance which he would have to travel for that purpose. One great evil was the want of Government assistance to the encouragement of agriculture. The Consul at Bosnia said the too frequent changes of the Government was a great evil, owing to the placing of persons in power who were ignorant of provincial affairs. The Consul at Damascus deplored the low state of agriculture, and the decrease of the population. A great deal had been said of the equilibrium and balance of power, but Turkey should be able to afford evidence of its efficiency to maintain itself as a Power worthy of consideration, and it was, he urged our interest to assist the development of the material resources of that country. Those regions were important in connection with that object; and it was most desirable that they should be under a Government which could give guarantees that it was able to maintain itself against those who might challenge it. He was bound to say he had some misgivings that the policy of this country lately had not been that of holding out a ready hand of assistance to organic elements whenever they had shown themselves, which might, in the event of a catastrophe occurring there, afford a useful substitute for the Government which now existed. He was alluding to the efforts which had been made of late by the Danubian Principalities to negotiate Treaties of Commerce. It might be said that that was a dangerous precedent, and that the Turkish Government might to some extent put a veto on those negotiations. But if any counsel had been given, as he believed it had, by our Government on that matter, he was afraid that they had rather come athwart, and had retarded the development of that which might have proved an element of strength at a future day. Imperfect as those countries had shown themselves in many respects, he thought it would be acknowledged by all who were acquainted with them that they possessed greater activity and vital force than were at present manifested in the Turkish Provinces. Would it not, then, be a wise policy on our part in every way to stretch out a hand of fellowship to those elements when they showed, not any political ambition, but a desire for material progress? There was great evidence of want of vital energy and mismanagement in the Turkish Provinces, and although they were told that the Turkish Government had never repudiated the payment of the interest on its debt; yet he wished to know how much of that interest had been paid out of loans contracted for the purpose of paying it. He admitted that no prudent politician would like to attempt to disturb the Turkish Empire—at all events, at the present moment. A chance circumstance such as occurred a few months ago on the Montenegrin frontier might, however, bring about an explosion which every politician would deplore. He did not wish to say anything harsh of Turkey, but still he hoped the criticisms made in the course of this discussion would, though unpalatable at first, prove beneficial in the end.

MR. BRUCE said, he had much knowledge of Turkish affairs, and regretted that observations had been made indicative of a desire on our part to interfere in their domestic affairs. He would, therefore, like to ask one question—namely, whether that House meant that they should undertake the government of Turkey? He had listened with some regret to some of the remarks made by his hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. Yorke) about the Sovereign and Ministers of an independent Power. In particular, he was sorry the statements about the Sultan's habits and mode of life had been quoted in the House of Commons. He also regretted that the hon. Member had spoken of one able administrator of the Empire in a way as if the hon. Member wished him to return to power; because it was undesirable that opinions favourable to any particular Minister resuming power in a foreign country should be given in that House. Some of the Turkish Ministers since Fuad Pasha and Ali Pasha did not deserve the language which had been applied to them, for they were men of since patriotism and undoubted ability. He had had great experience of Turkey, and was aware that there was much misgovernment in the country; but it must be borne in mind that it was most difficult to obtain accurate information on the subject. There was properly no independent Press, and no public opinion, while the ruling classes were from their nature singularly reticent. There was no middle class in Turkey, and the merely official superintendence of executive officers had seldom been able to keep them in order, unless those who were under them had the opportunity of expressing their opinions and making the Government feel how they were treated. Consequently, we were usually left to gather what occurred in the country from the stories of people who might be very ill-informed respecting the real condition of affairs. Under the system of capitulations those who should form the middle class were taken out of all responsibility, and placed under the jurisdiction of those Consular Courts, which were established in so many towns of the Turkish Empire. In many places there were Consuls of 16 different nationalities. The Consuls had dragomen, some of whom were scoundrels; and these people who occupied a kind of official position were able at any time to bring about the fall of any Governor who happened to displease them. He thought a great many of the administrative difficulties arose from the position in which foreigners were placed, a position without example in any European State. The want of progress of Turkey in reform was a great deal owing to the absence of that influence formerly exercised by the English Government. Events in Europe had changed the relative power of nations, and if the British Ambassador was active, the Russian and German Ambassadors would be active. As to the Christian population, he believed they had not been treated with any settled persecution by the Mahomedans; there might be in some remote parts persecution and violence, but even in the British Islands sometimes they had cases not altogether dissimilar. The Protestant sects generally had met with the sympathy and indulgence of the Turkish Government, because they were not animated with that anti-national feeling which belonged to some other creeds. They must not forget the position of the Christian population in Turkey. In Europe they had seen the effect of large Christian communities being under the influence of foreign Powers. They had seen what had happened in the case of the Roman Catholics of Germany and Poland, and in Turkey it was not wonderful if there was a little hostility. Besides, there was quite as much hostility between the different Christian sects as between the Mahomedans and the Christians, and those who had been at Jerusalem at the Great Festival, and seen how the Christians were only kept from flying at each other's throats, would admit there was a great deal of fanaticism that did not belong to Mahomedanism. The great difficulty which had to be met in Turkey was weak administration, and whatever might be said of its finances, it had as yet always paid its dividends. If the English Government should adopt any policy with regard to Turkey, it should be a policy not of men, but of principles, and its object should be not to interfere with the Turkish Government, but to prevent others from interfering. He regretted extremely that the much-needed reform as to the establishment of Consular Courts in Egypt—a subject which had been debated in that House last year—had not been carried out by Her Majesty's Government, all the more that as he understood France was the only Power which objected to take action in the matter. If such a policy was recommended with respect to Turkey, he hoped that England, for the sake of her own position and influence, would take an independent lead, and would not wait to see how other Powers would act.

MR. BOURKE said, that the Motion which had been so ably introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire might be divided into two portions. It first asked for the production of correspondence between the Sublime Porte and the Foreign Office relating to the non-fulfilment of the provisions of the Khathy Humâioun by the Government of the Sultan between 1856 and the present time. He had to inform his hon. Friend that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay upon the Table a considerable number of Papers relating to the alleged persecution of Christians in Turkey, and the Papers which his hon. Friend referred to would be found among them. With respect to that which was next asked for by his hon. Friend, there was no such Memorandum in the Foreign Office as that mentioned in the Notice; but there was a Memorandum of Fuad Pasha of May, 1867, which was no doubt that which his hon.

Friend required, and he would find that it had been for some years upon the Table of the House of Commons. In point of fact, therefore, there was nothing in the way of Papers to be moved for. His hon. Friend, however, proposed to call attention to the 9th clause of the Treaty of Paris and to the condition of Turkey, in so far as it bore on British interests. Now, he had listened with some curiosity throughout the debate to hear of anything which had special relation to British interests in connection with the subject referred to—namely, the Khathy Humâioun—and he had not heard a word which tended to show that British interests were specially affected by our relations with Turkey in that respect. [SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: The road to India.] Yes; but our road to India did not lie through Turkey. [SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Egypt.] Well, Egypt was, no doubt, a part of the Turkish Empire, but it was remarkable that during the entire discussion Egypt had been very little alluded to. However, with respect to that part of the Motion of his hon. Friend, he would ask the attention of the House to the 9th clause of the Treaty of Paris, and to the fact that that clause distinctly laid down that it was not the right of the Powers to interfere collectively or separately in the internal affairs of Turkey. The whole condition of the Turkish Empire had been minutely described, and not only its material condition, but the relations existing between the Turkish Empire and the other Powers had been adverted to. Questions relating to the Turkish Army, the Navy, its financial system, and the Civil List of the Sultan had been brought into the debate. He should be guilty of great indiscretion if he followed hon. Members into these various subjects, and Her Majesty's Government would be showing a bad example to the rest of the world if they interfered in the internal affairs of Turkey when it was the object of the signatories to the Treaty of Paris in the 9th Article to put an end to such an interference. Apart from the Treaty of Paris and our international obligations, there could be no greater act of imprudence than for the representative of a Foreign Department to enter into a discussion upon the internal affairs of a friendly Power, because in so doing

he would not fail to meet with delicate and difficult questions which were better fitted for diplomatic correspondence than for debates in the House of Commons. If that were true as a general principle, he must say that in the case of no country ought that principle to be more scrupulously followed than in the instance of Turkey; because, if they recollected the past history of Turkey, the variety of its races and religions, and the intensity of the rancour existing among different sects, it must be admitted that Turkey, of all the other nations of the world, necessarily encountered the greatest difficulties in the administration of her internal affairs. These difficulties, moreover, although great in themselves, were much increased by the relations of Turkey with Europe. And those who carped at and criticized the present condition of Turkey ought not to forget the struggle she underwent 40 years ago when she emancipated herself from the isolated position in which she had lain for centuries. When Reschid Pasha initiated the great reforms which would hand down his name to posterity as one of the greatest benefactors to Turkey that ever lived, he found himself surrounded with every difficulty which it was possible for an administrator to contend with. Old prejudices, then, still existed. The Christian races were treated with contumely, the dominant race was proud of its former conquests in Europe, Asia, and Africa, heavy taxes were levied upon her non-Mussulman population, who could not even travel without leave; they were shut out from employment, and every odious distinction existed between the Mussulman and Christian population. The Army had fallen into decay, the Navy had been destroyed at Navarino, and every province was in a state of popular tumult and disorganization. The edict which secured the principle of toleration was then issued. In theory it left nothing to be desired, because it left the Mussulman and non-Mussulman population of Turkey equal before the law. Then came the Crimean War, and the change since made in the condition of affairs in Turkey was most remarkable. In the first place, Turkey went through a great war with credit to herself. Her Army had since been completely re-organized. She had built herself a Navy. More than a thousand miles of railway had been made, and the improved position of the non-Mussulman portion of her population could not be denied. Elementary education had made progress, and though the financial and judicial arrangements of Turkey were not what we could wish them to be, they were a great contrast to the condition of things 50 years ago. Two things were clear—namely, that Turkey during the last 40 years had been in a state of transition, and that she had made considerable advance in tolerance and in material prosperity. The part of the speech of the Mover of the Resolution which he heard with most regret was that in which sweeping charges were made against individuals without any proof being adduced of the condemnations that were uttered. With regard to the bondholders, it had been the traditional policy of the Foreign Office to treat them as they were being treated at present. A despatch of Earl Russell's upon this subject had been quoted, and he wished to read from it another paragraph, which was as follows:—

“Her Majesty's Government will at all times be ready to give their unofficial support to bondholders in the prosecution of their claims upon foreign Governments, and such parties may always count upon moral influence being exercised on their behalf, but unofficially.”

This was the position which had always been assumed with regard to them, and it was not the intention of the Government to depart from it. We had already shown our goodwill towards Turkey by sending out a Commission which effected considerable reforms; and the Government would avail themselves of any opportunity of offering advice to the Government of Turkey. He could not say that the Khathy-Humâioun had been completely fulfilled; but he did not think that the non-Mussulman subjects of the Porte had now much to complain of as non-Mussulman subjects. In looking over some Papers which would shortly be presented to Parliament, he had been struck by the absence of any complaints of religious persecutions; and in one despatch Sir Henry Elliot said that nothing in the nature of the persecution of Christians by the authorities existed, but there was very decided sectarian persecution. The cases of cruelty that we heard of from time to time were really produced by these sectarian differences. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose certainly took a gloomy view of their condition; but he must remind him that we were now discussing the Khathy Humâioun of 1856, and the opinion of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member was certainly different from that which the right hon. Gentleman had now expressed; for, in 1872, in answer to a Question put by the late Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) in this House, the noble Lord who then represented the Foreign Office (Viscount Enfield) said that the latest reports from Constantinople stated that, as a general rule, the law affecting Christians was fairly carried out, and they had no ground of complaint. He would now make a few remarks on the speech of his noble Friend the Member for Clare County (Lord Francis Conyngham), who had spoken of the mission of the Evangelical Alliance to Constantinople. The deputation of the Evangelical Alliance, headed by his noble Friend, made a demand which was wholly unprecedented. It had never been the practice of the Sultan to receive deputations composed of foreigners on business of that kind. When the character of that deputation was considered, hon. Members would, he thought, agree that if the same thing were done in our own country precisely the same result would follow. He would put an analogous case. In Portugal there was no capital punishment. Now, supposing a deputation from Portugal were to come here and ask their Ambassador to obtain for them an audience of the Queen, for the purpose of appealing to Her Majesty to put an end to capital punishment in this country, he would probably decline to do so; and even if he did make the request to the Foreign Secretary, that Minister would repel any attempt to intrude upon Her Majesty's privacy. Besides, it must be remembered that the Sultan of Turkey had 17,000,000 Mussulman subjects who regarded him as their spiritual head; and he could conceive no act more likely to create rebellion among his subjects than for the Sultan to receive a deputation whose avowed object was to address His Majesty on the question of the conversion of Mahomedans to Christianity, and vice versâ. He would not now dwell with greater particularity on the proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance, as Papers relating to the subject would shortly be laid on the Table of the House. In conclusion, he would say that the progress of Turkey, although slow, was undoubted. It was true, indeed, that the Porte had not fulfilled its promises in many respects, but that was attributable more to the subordinates in the distant Provinces, than to any unwillingness on the part of the Porte itself. Her Majesty's present Government wished to make Turkey as strong and as powerful as possible; but he did not think the interference of our Ambassador at Constantinople in things which did not concern British interests would tend to produce that result. He rather thought it was by encouraging Turkey to depend on herself that she would attain to that condition of reform which was intended when the Treaty of Paris was promulgated in 1856. It was to be borne in mind that that was the great charter on which all reforms in Turkey were to be expected, and it was clearly understood by European Powers in general that these projected reforms, proceeding from the Sultan's own free will, did not give to the European Powers the right to interfere collectively or separately in the relations of the Sultan and his subjects or the internal administration of the Empire.

Mr. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, he should like to ask if the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs meant to say that the 9th Article in the Treaty of Paris did not give this country the right to see that the provisions of the Khathy Humâioun was observed? It would not be in the power of the Government of this country to enter into minute details; but if the right to interfere did not exist, how was how was it that Fuad Pasha entered minutely into the several representations made by the Embassy at Constantinople, and pointed out in answer to the remonstrances of the English Ambassador that the terms of that instrument had been carried out as fairly as circumstances would permit. That instrument was an embodiment of the reforming policy of the Emperor Mahmoud. Previous to his time two checks existed in Turkey against the autocracy of the Sultan; the one was the check of the Janissaries, and the other was the power of the Pashas, and it was through the popularity of the Emperor Mahmoud, and his Grand Vizier Reschid Pacha, who were the Louis Treize and Richelieu of Turkey, that these checks were allowed to go. The great mistake made at that time by the people of Turkey was that, whereas previous checks were destroyed, no new ones were created. If the Emperor Mahmoud had been less popular, previous restrictions might have remained in force. For the very reason that Mahmoud was popular, the checks were allowed to go. The difficulty in Turkey was that that country laboured under an absolute autocratic system, and whereas people from one end of the Empire to the other were in a state of the greatest possible discontent, there was no means of giving effect to their wishes. They were, in fact, in such a state that an hon. Gentleman had said if they had the greatest tyrant, they had no check on his madness. If even they had a madman on the Throne they had no power whatever to check his madness. Fuad Pacha, finding no check on the autocratic power of the Sultan, used the only means available at Constantinople, by inventing one, in the way of using the influence of the Embassies, and especially that of the British Embassy, in making representations, which under the guise of diplomatic remonstrances, virtually supported the policy which he and Ali Pasha had at heart. That check existed down to the period of the Crimean War, and it certainly was a strange thing to hear from a British Minister that his duty was merely limited to this—"We will give advice, if they ask us; but we will not put ourselves about to do it. We will give in an otiose easy way, sound advice when it is asked for; but we will not put ourselves about to do it." These were strange words indeed to be addressed to the British Parliament in a matter which so nearly concerned British interests as the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. The House of Commons of England was not a Governing Body. Nobody here sought to govern Turkey. But Turkey was bound to regard Treaty obligations. Ever since the time of Fuad Pacha the Khaththy Humatoun, that great Reform Bill of Turkey had been absolutely and entirely a dead letter. What was the condition of Turkey now? There could be no question that everything about that Empire was going to wreck and ruin. Her finances were hopelessly disordered, and there was a normal deficit of something like £5,000,000. There was corruption at the core. It was well known that the Judges were paid so miserably that their salaries were not equal to those of a body-clerk of an English Justice of the Common Pleas. Corruption was an obligatory vice with them. They were told that Turkey was improving and advancing. How was she improving or advancing? Twenty years ago she was a prosperous and well-ordered country compared with what she was now. The whole of her debt of £150,000,000 had been incurred during the last 20 years, and she had absolutely not an old pair of gloves to show for it. She was advancing, it was true, and rapidly, but it was down-hill, and in the paths that lead to destruction. As to Navy and Army reforms, he would like to know whether her iron-clads or her soldiers could keep an enemy out of Constantinople. If England were true to her enormous interests at stake, Turkey might yet be saved. It was because such language was used at Constantinople as had just been used by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in that House that Turkey was being driven to ruin and destruction by the selfish and incapable men at the head of her affairs; but it was not the language that should be used towards Turkey by a Minister who was mindful of our British and Indian interests. There could be no doubt that if misrule, and corruption, and reaction, and fanaticism had their own way, Turkey might be driven across the Bosphorus into Asia. It was only at Constantinople that they could expect to influence the Mahomedan people, and if that connection was cut off there would be no means left by which European Christianity could influence the Mahomedan world. If others were prepared to see the Turkish Empire break up, he as an Englishman could not view such a policy with complacency or satisfaction, and it was for that reason he deprecated the manner in which our duties towards Turkey appeared to be regarded by the Government. He, for one, felt that the very existence of the friendly State of Turkey depended upon the action which the British Government chose to take. They had in Turkey a great field for diplomatic action of the noblest kind, and the interests of the two countries were so reciprocal that the exercise of the influence of this country ought not to be wanting.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that anyone who heard the animated and eloquent speech of the hon. Member for Canterbury must think that the British Government had become estranged from the friendly Power of Turkey; but there was no such feeling on the part of the English Government. The English Government felt the deepest interest in the welfare of Turkey; and he did not understand upon what ground the hon. Member could assert that she did not now feel that interest. [MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE: I alluded to a new fact.] He was at a loss to understand what the hon. Member meant by a new fact. His hon. Friend had insisted that the English Government ought to interfere in the internal affairs of Turkey; but if the English Government did that, it was probable that in the course of six months our relations with Turkey would not be so friendly as they now were. The English Government was fully alive to the importance of maintaining Turkey in her position as an independent Power.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE explained that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs alluded to a new fact as causing the British Government not to feel that there were any British interests now in Turkey which England felt interest in.

MR. BOURKE explained that the hon. Member entirely misunderstood what he said in reference to British interests.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS—CONTINUED RETURNS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he put a Question that day to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs relating to Monastic and Conventual Institutions, and, not being satisfied with the hon. Gentleman's answer, he would now repeat his Question. It was, "Whether Her Majesty's Government would consent to furnish in continuation the information supplied to this House on the 27th of July, 1874, relating to the Laws and Ordinances affecting Monastic and Conventual Institutions abroad?" The Foreign Office had certainly taken their time in furnishing the information. The first information furnished was on the 1st of March, the next on the 29th of April, the next on the 4th of May, and the last on the 7th of July. [MR. SULLIVAN: I rise to call the hon. Member to Order.] The hon. Member for Louth was trying to set up a jurisdiction over this House. The question before them was one relating to Monastic and Conventual Institutions; but the information only came down to the 7th of July. There had been changes in the laws of Hungary, changes in the laws of Prussia, and changes in the laws of the Confederated States of Switzerland relating to these institutions, and it was desirable, considering the state of Europe, that this House should be furnished with further information respecting them. He therefore asked the hon. Gentleman whether he was able to furnish any further information in continuation on the subject?

MR. BOURKE said, he had taken a great deal of trouble to supply to the House information in compliance with the Address of July last. If the hon. Gentleman would give him the names of the countries from which he desired that information should be obtained on this subject, he would endeavour to supply it. He would take that opportunity of protesting against the language of the hon. Member for Canterbury (MR. Butler-Johnstone) in respect to his reply on the Motion which had been just negatived, that he must have been either asleep or in a brown study during the speech of the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (MR. Yorke). That language was neither courteous or such as ought to be applied to him.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, that as the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had in his speech observed that nothing had been said about British interests in the course of the debate, whereas the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire had, during a long speech, spoken upon that question, he could come to no other conclusion than that either the hon. Gentleman must have spoken in a very low tone, or else that the Under Secretary must either have been asleep or in a brown study.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

PHARMACY BILL.—[BILL 175.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to carry into effect the unanimous recommendation of a Committee which carefully inquired into the subject last Session. The Pharmaceutical Society of London objected, however, to the 18th clause, which enacted reciprocity between the Irish and English societies with regard to the granting of legal qualifications to chemists; and he intended at the next stage of the Bill to withdraw the clause.

DR. WARD objected to the omission of the clause, because it would tend to increase the number of institutions which could confer legal qualifications.

MR. NEWDEGATE, on the part of the Pharmaceutical Society, thanked his right hon. Friend for proposing to omit the clause in question.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

ENTAIL AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to further amend the Law of Entail in Scotland, said, it was not his purpose to occupy the time of the House long; but as the Bill related to a subject which affected very materially the welfare not only of landowners, but of tenants, and the public generally in Scotland, it was proper to indicate shortly the Amendments which the House was asked to sanction. In 1685 the system of strict entail was introduced into Scotland. It had its benefits, but it was also attended with corresponding disadvantages. The so-called owner of an entailed estate was so in name only. He could not dispose of it either during his life, or by a deed taking effect at his death, nor could he charge upon it any sums which he had expended in its improvement, however valuable and lasting the improvement might be, or make any provision upon it for his widow or children. After the lapse of nearly a century the Act 10 Geo. III., c. 5, generally known as "The Montgomery Act," was passed, to give heirs of entail certain powers of charging upon the estate a proportion (three-fourths) of the money expended by them on its permanent improvement, such money not exceeding four years' free rent. Besides the limited character of the improvements recognized, and of the proportion of the money expended thereon allowed to be charged under that Act, the procedure under it was very cumbrous and expensive. In 1825 "The Aberdeen Act" (Geo. IV., c. 87) was passed, enabling the heirs of entail to make certain provisions for their widows and younger children; the latter, however, being dependent on the children's surviving their father, and not being available for their issue if they pre-deceased him. Down to 1848, however, no facilities were given for terminating entails, which if made in conformity with the provisions of the Act of 1685, were really perpetual. In 1848 the then Lord Advocate (Rutherford) carried his Entail Amendment Act (11 & 12 Vict., c. 36), an admirably drawn measure, and one which had produced most valuable results. The main provisions of the Act were that—(1) entails might be set aside with the consent of a certain number—never exceeding three—of the heirs entitled to succeed, the nearest heir always being of the age of 25 before giving his consent; (2) that any heir born after the 1st August, 1848, might disentail an estate entailed before that date without any consent; (3) that any heir born after the date of any future entail might disentail without any consent; (4) power was given to the heir in possession to charge three-fourths of his improvement expenditure on the estate by way of rent-charge, or bond of annual rent, the rate of interest not exceeding £7 2s. per cent, such rate paying off capital and interest in 25 years; (5) instead of granting a bond of annual rent or rent-charge, the heir in possession might grant a bond and disposition in security over the estate for two thirds of his improvement expenditure. As time had passed on, while the value of "The Rutherford Act" was still thoroughly recognized, it had come to be felt that further relaxations of the law were necessary under their old entails. The age of 25 in the nearest heir was found to be unnecessary. In many districts the entailed proprietors could not make any further expenditure in improving their estates from the limited extent to which they could charge such expenditure thereon. Further, as more than 25 years had elapsed since the passing of "The Rutherford Act," it was widely felt that increased facilities should be given to heirs of entail to bar the entail, due regard being had to all substantially vested interests. In considering whether further relaxations should be made on the law of entail, it was of great importance that the distinction should be kept in view between entails made before and those made after 1st August, 1848. The latter so closely resembled settlements of entail in England that it was not proposed to interfere with them, except in allowing a nearest heir to give his consent to a disentail at 21 instead of 25, the age at which in England a remainder-man might bar an entail. In regard to old entails—that was, entails made before 1848—it was proposed (1.) to make provision for dispensing with the consent of any heir except the nearest heir, due provision being made for the ascertainment of the value of the expectancy of any other of the heirs whose consent was at present necessary, and for such value being paid or secured. (2.) It was proposed to give increased facilities for spending money on the permanent improvement of the estate, and for such money being charged upon it. (3.) It was proposed to enable heirs of entail to convert existing rent-charges or bonds of annual rent over the estate into charges upon the fee of the estate. (4.) It was proposed to provide that provisions in favour of younger children should not lapse by their pre-decease, but should be available to their issue. (5.) It was proposed to improve and simplify, and as a consequence to cheapen, the procedure in applications to the Court for disentailing estates or charging them with improvement expenditure. These proposals might not satisfy those who desired a total abolition of the system of entail, but they would give great and substantial relief to many entailed proprietors, and encourage them to make renewed efforts to improve the estates in their possession, which could not but be more beneficial to the tenants occupying them and to the country at large. The Bill had been introduced at the urgent request of many hon. Members on both sides of the House, and it could only be passed during the present Session if it met, as there was reason to believe it would, with general acceptance.

Motion agreed to.

POLICE CONSTABLES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law in regard to Constables and Police Officers in Scotland, explained that it was in reference to certain proceedings under an old Act by which gamekeepers were sworn in as constables, and were put under the control of the county police.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEBT (SINKING FUND) BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer
Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 142.] THIRD READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [18th June], "That the Bill be read the third time upon Monday next."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Third Reading deferred till Thursday next.

ENTAIL AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to further amend the Law of Entail in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary CROSS, and Mr. CAMERON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 212.]

POLICE CONSTABLES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to amend the Law in regard to Constables and Peace Officers in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary CROSS, and Sir HENRY SELWYN-IBRETON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 213.]

just after 5 o'clock, which was before the time of Public Business, and yet letters had been read and language had been used in which there was strong condemnation of Messrs. Moody and Sankey. He did not wish to pass an opinion one way or the other upon the matter to which it related; but he did think that in a matter of such high importance, and one in which the feelings of the country were excited, the House ought to have had full Notice before being called upon to consider it.

LORD LYTTELTON said, that the fault which the noble Earl had found with him and the noble Marquess who had asked the Question was chargeable, not on them, but on the gentlemen who had commenced proceedings at Eton without notice. The suddenness of their proceedings had made it impossible that any Notice of this discussion could have been given to the noble Earl and his friends Messrs. Moody and Sankey.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he thought it was a Standing Order of their Lordships' House that no Question which was likely to lead to a discussion should be asked without Notice.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that as he understood the Rule of the House to which the noble Earl had just referred, it was that no Question likely to lead to a discussion should be asked without regular Notice in cases in which it was possible to give such Notice; but there were cases in which it was not. As, however, he thought this question had been sufficiently discussed, he ventured to suggest that they ought to proceed to the Orders of the Day.

POOR LAW—PAUPERS (ORDERS OF REMOVAL).—MOTION FOR RETURNS.

LORD HENNIKER said: I do not intend to trouble your Lordships with an elaborate speech, but I seek rather to make as short and clear a statement of facts as is possible. The subject of the Law of Settlement and Removal of the Poor is a difficult and complicated one to deal with briefly, and I must ask your Lordships' indulgence for a short time. I must remind the House that I brought in a Bill last year to do away with removal: it was the general opinion of the House that it should not then be read a second time, and I, accordingly, withdrew it. I, as it were, undertook to ascertain the feeling of the country on the subject during the Recess: this I have endeavoured to do by sending a private circular to various Boards of Guardians, selected roughly, so as to test the opinion of the country generally, and I will give your Lordships the result of this inquiry presently. I have, however, come to the conclusion that more information is required, so I am content with the course I propose to pursue at present. To make my argument fairly complete, I must touch, in a few words only, on one or two points in the history of the Law of Settlement and Removal. It is not necessary for me to enter into details, for your Lordships are fully aware of the provisions of the law as they at present exist. The Law of Settlement, or domicile, was established first in the Danish and Anglo-Saxon times, as a mutually protective measure chiefly; and to promote social order and good government, each man was bound to belong to a community, or to enter himself in some burh, but he could always change his place of residence with the greatest ease. This is a point I wish to call your Lordships' attention to particularly—that every man was free to move from one place to another. Passing swiftly over the law of Edward III. against free labour, and those of Richard II., Henry VII., and Elizabeth, chiefly directed against rogues and vagabonds, that is to say, vagrancy; we come to the law of Charles II. which was the origin of the Law of Removal—the greatest infringement, perhaps, of the rights of Englishmen since the Conquest. This law unsettled the poor, and made almost everyone liable to removal. The law continued in this state till 1795, in George III.'s reign, when no one was removable unless actually chargeable to the rates. I now come to the present law, under which a period of irremovability has been established; first of five years, then of three years, and now of one year, the sole remnant of the harsh and cruel law of Charles II. To illustrate the working of the present law, I will take a few cases. First, one or two hypothetical cases. Suppose a pauper to become chargeable to the rates somewhere in the North of England, his settlement is derived from his grandfather, the grandfather's settlement is in Cornwall. Soon after gaining ships' House during the Administration of the late Government (the Earl of Morley). His noble Friend would speak for himself, as a member of the Governing Body of Eton, if he thought right to do so. There had been handed to him two or three letters, which were in continuation of the correspondence already published, and as these also would appear in the newspapers of to-morrow morning he did not think there could be any harm in reading them to their Lordships. As the matter had been made public, the more publicity that could be given to it now the better. The writer of some of these letters was Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; and he must beg to remark that, as far as the Governing Body were concerned, the responsibility of which that right hon. Gentleman and others had spoken did not exist as he believed. They had a responsibility within their proper functions; but such a permission as that referred to by the noble Marquess was within the sphere of his authority, and not theirs. Subject to the ultimate authority of the Governing Body, which was of a character to which he need not further allude—it had been brought into prominence by what occurred at another Public School (Rugby) a year or two ago—the Head Master was not bound by the opinion of the Governing Body in respect of any question respecting the daily regulation of the school. Of course the Governing Body could give an opinion on such a question, or on any other, but they had no means of enforcing compliance with it on the part of the Head Master. With those explanatory observations he would read the letters which he had mentioned to their Lordships, [which his Lordship accordingly did].

THE EARL OF MORLEY, having been appealed to by his noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton) as one of the Governing Body, wished to corroborate the statement of his noble Friend in relation to the religious services in question—the matter had come upon the Governing Body quite suddenly. It was impossible, even if it were desirable, within the short interval at their disposal, to call together the Governing Body of the College with the view of considering the subject, and it would be unbecoming in him to offer an opinion as to the desirability or undesirability of the proposed meeting until he had the opportunity of consultation with his Colleagues. Moreover, he had no notion that a Question relating to the subject would be asked by the noble Marquess that evening. There was some doubt, however, whether the Governing Body had any power in the matter at all, inasmuch as all matters relating to the discipline of the school, the daily arrangement of the work, and the liberty given to the boys, rested with the Head Master. But whether the Governing Body had or had not authority in a case like the present was a question open to doubt, and one, therefore, which he should not like to pronounce an opinion on until he had had the opportunity of conversing with his Colleagues.

LORD OVERSTONE was understood to say that he regarded the question before their Lordships as one of very great importance. It had reference to the regulations of a great Public School, in which were educated youths who would hereafter fill high positions in this country, and some of whom would be Members of their Lordships' House. As he understood the proposal to which the question of the noble Marquess had reference, it was to hold what were called—whether truly or not he did not know—religious services in a tent to be erected within the very grounds of the College. Those services were to be of a sensational character, to be specially addressed to the boys of the school, but not under the control of the authorities of the school, the Provost, or the Head Master. In his opinion, the case was one eminently calling for promptitude and decision. The religious teaching of their greatest public school ought not to pass into other hands than those of the constituted authorities, and he hoped that if the Head Master did not refuse his sanction to the proposal, the Governing Body would not hesitate to express their judgment.

THE EARL OF MORLEY wished to point out to the noble Lord who had just spoken that it was not proposed to erect the tent within the College grounds, but in the South Meadows, just outside those grounds.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY thought that there ought to have been Notice of a Question on a subject which was certain to give rise to discussion. This discussion had been commenced

just after 5 o'clock, which was before the time of Public Business, and yet letters had been read and language had been used in which there was strong condemnation of Messrs. Moody and Sankey. He did not wish to pass an opinion one way or the other upon the matter to which it related; but he did think that in a matter of such high importance, and one in which the feelings of the country were excited, the House ought to have had full Notice before being called upon to consider it.

This law unsettled the poor, and made almost everyone liable to removal. The law continued in this state till 1795, in George III.'s reign, when no one was removable unless actually chargeable to the rates. I now come to the present law, under which a period of irremovability has been established; first of five years, then of three years, and now of one year, the sole remnant of the harsh and cruel law of Charles II. To illustrate the working of the present law, I will take a few cases. First, one or two hypothetical cases. Suppose a pauper to become chargeable to the rates somewhere in the North of England, his settlement is derived from his grandfather, the grandfather's settlement is in Cornwall. Soon after gaining a settlement there the grandfather goes to a Lancashire Union, there the father is born; the father goes to a Union in Yorkshire when he is old enough to take care of himself, and the pauper is born there. The pauper, when he, in turn, is old enough, goes to Cumberland, and when he becomes chargeable, if he has no acquired settlement of his own, he is removable to Cornwall. He has never been there himself, nor has his father ever been in Cornwall, but he may become permanently chargeable, from the fact that no one knows him, and that the work he has been accustomed to is entirely different; so he has no refuge but the rates. Perhaps some noble Lords may say this is an extreme case, but it is one which may, and, I believe, does happen under the existing law. It is one of no little hardship, and it is one I confidently affirm, is more than possible, and may occur at any time under the law as it stands. The hardest cases of all, however, are those which affect illegitimate children, removable when they arrive at the age of 16 to the place of their birth. A child might never have been, except in its earliest infancy, in the place of its birth—say, Leeds; but from some unforeseen cause or another—permanent disability, perhaps—it is removed from its mother, its proper guardian, and left to the care of strangers. What can be more impolitic? What can tend more to pauperize the child? It is removed from its friends, and what refuge can it have but the workhouse, or a constant chargeability to the rates? This is a very hard case, and one of frequent occurrence. These two cases are enough to show the complication of the law and its hardship, but they may be supplemented by numberless real cases. Not to weary your Lordships with endless details, I will proceed to give one or two real cases which have occurred within a short period. A woman of excellent character was deserted by her husband, she was removed from the West Derby Union to Preston: 3s. a-week would have enabled her to remain with her aged mother; neither she or her husband had ever been to Preston. The result was, that the ratepayers of Preston, taking it in the ratepayers' point of view, had to maintain her and her children at a cost of £2 a-week, whereas a cost of 3s. a-week to the removing Union would have avoided all hardship and some unnecessary expense. Again, to take a case of very great importance, and one of great hardship. It is of particular importance from the fact that it led to a distinct opinion being given by three Judges on the present state of the law. It is one of a break of residence. The question raised was the validity of an order for the removal of a pauper from the parish of Birmingham to the Worcester Union. It appeared that the pauper, named Hardman, a tailor, had lived and supported himself for 45 years in the parish of Birmingham, prior to the 30th of May, 1872, when he was received into the Birmingham Workhouse. In November, a tailor, named Rose, who lived in West Smethwick, out of Birmingham, hired the pauper. The pauper went and resided in West Smethwick, and worked for Rose for 3s. a-week, with board and lodging. He resided there for 10 weeks, and then returned to Birmingham, when he again became chargeable to the rates. Rose told the pauper, when he hired him, that he could stay as long as he liked if they agreed. The question was, whether the residence of the pauper for 10 weeks at Smethwick operated as a break of residence, preventing a continuous residence for the period of one year, so as to confer the status of irremovability. In giving judgment, the Lord Chief Justice said—

"I wish very much we could hold that the pauper was irremovable, for I think it is a most cruel thing, if not an abuse of the power of the parochial officer, to send a man away, who has resided 45 years in the same place, to a place where he had a legal settlement, but not a friend or acquaintance in the world to whom he could turn for a word of comfort. It is a very hard thing, and if I could only find that this man was irremovable from Birmingham, I should certainly keep him there."

Mr. Justice Blackburn said—

"I am also extremely sorry to be obliged to come to the conclusion that the pauper is not irremovable. Here, a man having been resident in Birmingham for 45 years, came into the workhouse there, and because he, like an honest man, went out of the workhouse to endeavour to get work, and happened to step across the boundary of the parish, he is sent away from the place from which he has not been absent for 45 years. The cruelty is obvious, and the hardship very great."

Mr. Justice Lush said—

"I share in the regret expressed by my Lord and my brother Blackburn, in having to decide that this man must be removed; but cases of hardship do arise, and will arise however the Act of Parliament may be framed. There are extreme cases not contemplated by the framers of the Act."

Such, then, my Lords, is the law, and such the opinion of the Judges upon it. But to turn to the opinion of the outside public on this question. An important conference which was held in London under the presidency of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Fortescue) at the end of last year, pronounced in favour of the abolition of these laws, and so did a conference held at Malvern in May last. These meetings were attended by a large number of those who are most experienced in the administration of the Poor Laws, and their opinion is most valuable. By the kindness of friends, and from reliable information from various quarters, I have been able to ascertain the general feeling of the country. In one Poor Law district, no clerk to a Union—and the clerks to Unions are as capable as any other class of forming a sound opinion, if not more so—is in favour of the retention of these laws, and six only out of 39 Unions are in favour of retaining the law as it stands. This seems to be an example of the general opinion—even Sheffield and Salford are of the same opinion, and I believe the large towns, as a whole, will eventually agree with me that these laws should be abolished. I could quote many other instances from other districts which support the same view of the subject. But let me turn to the direct information I have received. I have consulted various Boards of Guardians, as I have already informed your Lordships, by a circular, and the result is as follows:—Out of 51 replies I have received, 38 are in favour of the abolition of the Law of Removal, and so of the Law of Settlement of the Poor; six are against it, and seven are doubtful. I will not trouble your Lordships with details, but, as a sample of the replies I have received, I will quote one or two. A letter from Birmingham says—"We find 110 persons were transferred from our relief lists to their own settlements, as against 26 only charged to us." This letter goes on to advocate non-resident relief. This pauperizing document is at any of your Lordships' disposal. Then, again, Liverpool is alarmed. Why, no one can tell, for I left Ireland out of my Bill last year to a great extent, if not entirely, to avoid any possible hardship which might arise in seaport towns. Then, as a sample of opposing unions, I may quote a letter from Reigate. Amongst other things it says—"During the last year 67 persons have been removed to their various places of settlement (effecting thereby a saving of nearly £1,000 per annum) from the parish of Reigate alone." Such are the reasons given against an abrogation of these laws, and I venture to say they are hardly worthy of the great communities who give them. Then there are the doubtful class; those who advocate a national rate; those who say there is not sufficient workhouse accommodation, as Rochdale, and so on. But let me pass to the class who are favourable to my proposition. I will not take any country Unions. The replies from that quarter are able and complete, but I will take my instances from the towns, where the greatest opposition generally lies, and not from the country, where I have every reason to be grateful for support. The reply I have received to my circular from Manchester states—

"That this Board having been requested to express its views upon the present bearing of the Law of Settlement and Removal, and as to how far it might be expedient, or otherwise, to abolish entirely or further restrict the liability of paupers to removal, hereby records its opinion, that, though this township must incur a considerable additional expenditure by the change, this Board, feeling bound to regard the general interests of the country at large, considers that the time has arrived for the entire repeal of the law; as being inconsistent with the spirit of the age, and in many cases inflicting much needless hardship on individuals, while conferring no counter-balancing benefit on the community."

The Overseers of the Poor at Manchester agree in this opinion. Then the St. Pancras Board of Guardians tell me in their reply that they instruct the clerk of the Board to write to the Local Government Board—"To direct their attention to the hardship inflicted on the poor by the operation of the existing Law of Settlement, with a view to the same being abolished." So I might go on with Preston and other large towns and unions. Many Unions offered to memorialize Government—the Wortley Union, for instance—or to do anything in their power to support the view I take of this question. I have endeavoured to put a few test cases shortly before your Lordships; of hardships to the poor, of the effect of the law upon Unions, and to show the general feeling of the country. Now, my Lords, to take one or two of the objections to my proposal. They are chiefly, if not entirely, from the large towns, and they are based, I am sorry to say, upon more or less selfish motives, and not upon the broad policy of the general good of the country. The large towns often benefit by the labour of men reared in the country districts. Why are they not to support them in their old age, even if there are exceptional cases where it would be a hardship to do so? I have endeavoured to ascertain the proportion of the population which probably migrate to towns from the rural districts. Of course, like most returns, the test may be said to be slight; particularly as there is no actual test of the proportion of the rural population which go to the large towns. I have taken the population of 1861 and that of 1871 as a basis. I have taken the real increase of population, and I have compared the real increase with what the natural increase of population should have been taking the increase of births over deaths. I have taken two counties and two towns—two agricultural counties, as purely agricultural as can well be found, and two large towns, as good instances as can be found of manufacturing, or rather purely town communities. In Lincolnshire the population in 1861 was 404,138; in 1871, 428,075. The natural increase should have been 56,060, but the actual increase was only 23,937—a deficiency of 32,123. In Suffolk the population in 1861 was 335,409; in 1871, 347,210. The natural increase should have been 41,250, but the actual increase was only 11,801, leaving a deficiency of 29,449. In London, the population in 1861 was 2,803,989, and in 1871, 3,254,260. The natural increase should have been 321,870, but the actual increase was 450,271, leaving a surplus of 128,401. In Leeds, the population in 1861 was 184,006; in 1871, 162,421. The natural increase should have been 18,580, but the actual increase was 28,415, or a surplus of 9,835. What does this mean? That a considerable portion of the population reared in the country districts, and chargeable there up to a certain time of life, when they become really useful for the first time, go somewhere else, and I think it may be fairly urged that some of these, at all events, go to the large towns. If so, what is the hardship to the towns who take them when they are of use, to bear the burden of supporting them when they become old and worn out in their service—in increasing their wealth and prosperity? I should be inclined to say the hardships would be on the other side. Again, an objection to my proposal is, the prospect of an inundation of paupers in large towns in times of distress. The argument I have just used applies here again; but, to use another, what can end more to revive individual interest amongst Poor Law Guardians, or to establish a just and uniform system in the administration of the Poor Laws, than the total abolition of the Law of Settlement and Removal? Guardians have no right to make the workhouse a place of pleasure, as it is now in many places, and one of the great difficulties preventing a proper administration of the Poor Law is the difference there is in the mode of carrying it out. Mr. George Coode, in his able Report, says—

“That such an administration of the Poor Law in the towns, as would make relief there as little eligible as it is considered in the parish of the poor man's settlement, would produce the same effect as the prospect of removal, with a benefit to the town.”

This disposes, too, of the argument that these laws cannot be dispensed with, as they are a sure test of real destitution. There are plenty of tests and safeguards if the law is only properly administered. When you examine the matter closely there is but little sound argument which can be used in the point of view taken by the towns. When the Union Chargeability Act was passed, it conferred a great benefit upon towns at the expense of rural districts, by shifting the burdens in many cases. In the discussions on this measure the towns—very properly I think—would not for a moment listen to the plea of individual interest on the part of rural districts, as it was against the policy of the Poor Laws. How can they turn round now and use a contrary argument? It is said that the abolition of this Law of Settlement and Removal will lead to an increase of vagrancy. The law was all very well in times gone by as a protection against vagrancy, but it must be remembered that the vagrant class move about freely from place to place now. It really is a matter of police. Wherever the police have been allowed to deal with this class, they have dealt with them successfully. Admiral M'Hardy, the excellent Chief Constable for Essex, reduced the number of vagrants in 10 Unions in Essex from 24,882 to 2,977—a decrease of 21,903 in a single half-year—in 1849. It may be said by this means you only send these vagrants from one county to another; but if there were a more uniform system in the management of the police this would never occur. If the police could deal with vagrancy in 1849, surely they can do so now. One of the difficulties which presented itself on bringing in the Bill last year was the fact that the dispensing of various charities throughout the country depended on the settlement of the recipients. Settlement, however, was not included in the Bill of last year, but when I look carefully into this part of the question, it really is not one of much importance, for, as a matter of fact, under the present efficient management and schemes of the Charity Commission, the settlement of poor persons is seldom, if ever, inquired into. I am a trustee of various charities, and I never heard of such an inquiry being made. I have now, my Lords, disposed of some, if not most, of the objections to my proposal. Let me proceed to state shortly the advantages which I believe would arise from its adoption. It would re-establish, as in the olden times, the free migration of labour first restricted in the time of Charles II.; it would improve the administration of the Poor Law generally, as I have already pointed out, and restore individual interest, and it would do away with the iniquitous practice of non-resident relief, which can hardly be done away with in any other way. What say the Poor Law Commission, in their ninth Report as to non-resident relief? and I need say no more, I think, to condemn this practice completely—

“It is needless to condemn a system which, by common consent of all experienced persons, is vicious in principle, in practice, and at best can be considered as barely tolerated by law.”

It would avoid many hardships to the poor: it would do good to the Unions generally, for the benefit received by them would more than counter-balance any injustice which may arise in exceptional cases: it would once more reduce legal expenses, as is shown by the fact that from the time of the establishment of a status of irremovability in 1845 to 1871 the pauperism had increased from 5,039,703 in 1845, to 7,886,724 in 1871, while the law costs had diminished from £95,397 to £18,079; it would do away with this wretched remnant of an unnecessary law, which has been mitigated from time to time. In 1795, 8,000,000 of the people of England were set free by the alteration of this law, in a time of disorder and distress, without difficulty or danger. Why should it be dangerous now, in a time of prosperity and good order, to get rid of this remnant of a law which was never intended for the purpose it is at present put to? If any alteration of the law were likely to be of service, or to settle the question, I, for one, should say by all means amend it; but such a course would do little or no real good. As an instance, your Lordships will see non-resident relief could not be done away with. The operation of the law is so limited now, except in creating hardships and difficulties, that I say at once, do away with the Law of Settlement and Removal of the Poor. The Select Committee of the House of Commons, which sat in 1847, recommended such a course. It must do good, it cannot do harm: it will eradicate a great deal of useless law from the Statute Book, and it will be a boon to the poorer classes, which, I think, can hardly be estimated. Now, my Lords, I have not referred to the question of pauper lunatics. It is one of very little comparative difficulty, particularly now when the Government give largely towards their maintenance; and it is really a question of misfortune, rather than one of pauperism—so thought the Committee of 1847. Of Scotland and Ireland, too, I have said nothing. Their cases are different from that of England and Wales in many respects. No doubt, hardships do exist in Ireland, but I have not yet made up my mind that this law can be safely, or properly abolished in these countries. At all events, this part of the question requires further consideration. Scotland and Ireland are included in the Returns I move for, merely because it is a continuation of a Return made in 1868. The fact that no Return has been made since 1868 shows that further information is required. The most important part, perhaps, of the Return is that relating to removals by consent. Years ago there was often a good deal of trouble, particularly at the Local Government Board, as to removals, but this has diminished. Perhaps this is partly from the fact that a good many removals are made by consent. My Lords, I have spoken strongly on this subject, but I do not think more strongly than the subject deserves. I hope when fresh information is obtained that the Government will take up the question. It is rather too large a one for a private Member of your Lordships' House to deal with satisfactorily. Under these circumstances, I think those who agree with me, both inside and outside this House, will see I am wiser to put off immediate action, whatever my own opinion may be, and I hope, by doing so, I may really press forward the object I have in view more effectually. I have attempted to place this question before your Lordships, but it is difficult to do so in a single speech. I have endeavoured to divest my remarks from all semblance of sentiment. I have only one object in view—to be of use in the matter; to abolish a useless law; to free the poor man as much as possible, and to extend a sound public policy with respect to the Poor Laws. I only hope others more able to deal satisfactorily with the subject will take it up and deal promptly with it. I beg to move for the following Returns:—

"Return showing the number of orders of removal from unions and parishes signed by justices and executed in England and Wales, during the years 1869 to 1875, inclusive, ending the 25th day of March 1875; stating the number of persons removed, the nature of alleged settlement, and the amount of expenses incurred in the removal, including the cost of obtaining the orders, serving the same, and travelling expenses of the paupers removed, but not the cost of relief before removal; distinguishing the orders so executed from or to parishes not in union and between different unions; stating also the number of orders of removal of Scotch and Irish paupers and paupers belonging to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man during the same period (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 477, of Session 1868):

"Like Return in respect of paupers removed from one union to another by consent and without order."—(Lord Hartismere.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was not going to raise an objection altogether to the Returns moved for by his noble Friend; but he would propose that those Returns should be for one year instead of for five years. Returns for the latter period would involve a serious amount of preparation. These Papers related to one year, and therefore for the purposes of comparison it would be better if the Returns now to be ordered were also to be made for one year. His noble Friend (Lord Henniker) had said that he did not intend to go into the whole question of Poor Law Removal; but—though he did not find fault with him for it—he thought he had travelled over a very large history and over the whole ground of Settlement and Removal. There were few subjects of greater importance; and it was connected with the subject which was so fully discussed the other evening on the Motion of his noble Friend (Lord Lytton)—namely, the subject of out-door relief. As he understood his noble Friend, he proposed to get rid of the law of Settlement altogether, and to establish a state of things in this country which did not exist in any other. Certainly, in France and in Belgium every one was supposed to have a domicile in some locality; and he was not disposed to think that it would be advisable to do away with the Law of Settlement in this country. His noble Friend admitted that the restrictions had been made much less stringent. First, there was the condition of "residence;" afterwards, there was "three years' residence;" but the period had subsequently been reduced to one year, at which it at present stood; and there was also the chargeability to the whole Union. He would not go into figures, but he would make a remark or two on some of the illustrations of hardship cited by his noble Friend—because he did not think that a sound argument as to what should be the general law could be based on cases which seldom occurred. The case of the labourer whose grandfather was born in Northumberland, whose father was born in Cornwall, and who himself was born in Lancashire, was not likely to occur very often; but if that labourer had resided for one year in one place he would have acquired a settlement there. The tailor's was no doubt a hard case, but hard cases would occur from time to time, under any possible system. He did not think any great hardship had been shown in the case of the daughter of the widow who lived at West Derby.

Lord Henniker

If the woman had not removed to Preston, she would have had a settlement in West Derby. His noble Friend said that the general feeling of the country was in favour of the abolition of the Law of Settlement. With all respect to his noble Friend, he did not think that was the case. His noble Friend said that the majority of the Chairmen of 49 Unions thought that the Law of Settlement ought to be abolished; but he seemed to forget that the number of Unions in this country was 650, and therefore to claim for his majority that they expressed the opinion of England on the subject was straining the argument too far. His noble Friend admitted that it would not be safe to include Ireland or Scotland in the provisions of the Bill; and with that view he (the Duke of Richmond) concurred; but when his noble Friend made that admission there was an end of his case. He then spoke of Liverpool; but when it was borne in mind how great was the number of Irishmen who came over to this country and would find themselves charged on the rates of Liverpool it was, he thought, reasonable that the rate-payers of that town should not be called upon to support Irish or Scotch or the people of any other country who happened to arrive there in large numbers. The same objection and the same answer would apply to other parts of the country—for instance, to the hop-picking districts, to which large numbers of persons rushed during the hop-picking season. As to the vagrant case, he agreed with his noble Friend in the opinion that it was one of great difficulty, even though as he said, it might fairly be made a question of police. His noble Friend appeared to suppose it to be possible that if his view were acted upon it would lead to a more uniform system of police; but he (the Duke of Richmond) did not know what a uniform system of police meant, unless it was one for the establishment of a police throughout the whole country under one central authority, and he did not imagine the public were prepared for such centralization as that would imply. He ventured to differ, he might add, from the noble Lord as to the power of doing away altogether with the Law of Settlement, for the time, he felt certain, had had not yet arrived for dealing with that question. He did not object to a Return showing these Orders of Removal from the 25th day of March, 1874 to the 25th day of March, 1875.

LORD LYTTLETON thought that the Law of Settlement and Removal was entirely indefensible, and ought to be abolished. In these days, when the facilities of locomotion were so great, it was desirable to give the labourer the power of working where he thought best, with as little restriction as possible, and if, unfortunately, he should become destitute, he must be relieved on the spot. No doubt this presupposed, if it was to work satisfactorily, two principles: the one, a stringent administration of the general law; the other, a wide extension of the area of incidence of local taxation. But both these he considered good in themselves, and therefore it strengthened the argument. He feared that his noble Friend (Lord Henniker) would get nothing more from his Motion at present than a discussion of the subject; but these repeated discussions would, no doubt, gradually lead the minds of the people in the right direction, and ultimately he hoped there would be an abolition of those laws.

SCOTCH AND IRISH PEERAGES.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

EARL STANHOPE, in rising to put a Question to his noble Relative who was the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Representative Peerage of Scotland and Ireland which sat last year, and who had conducted the inquiry with so much ability, said, that that Committee had concluded their Report with several recommendations. They represented that since the Union the number of Members of the Lower House representing Scotch constituencies had been increased from 45 to 60, while the number of Scotch Representative Peers remained at 16; and they recommended that an addition of five should be made. As regarded Ireland, in consequence of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, four seats of the holders of spiritual Sees in Ireland in that House had been rendered vacant, and they recommended that their places should be supplied by increasing, to the same extent, that was by four seats, the number of Representative Peers. The noble Earl the Chairman of the Committee brought forward a proposition for securing a representation of the minority at the election of the Representative Peers, but his proposition was defeated. He (Earl Stanhope) was a friend in principle to the representation of minorities, and had voted and spoken in 1868 for the clause in the Reform Bill establishing what were called the three cornered constituencies in counties and in cities. But it must be owned that up to this time the practical results had not been satisfactory, and the system was still upon its trial in the House of Commons. Under these circumstances, he (Earl Stanhope) could not give his vote in the Committee for the permanent establishment of that system in the House of Lords. The Committee was unanimous in their opinion that the position of Irish and Scotch Peers, as having high titular rank unaccompanied by legislative duties, was anomalous, and that it was desirable the anomaly should, if means could be found of removing it, be done away with. They did not for a moment entertain the idea of the wholesale introduction of the Irish and Scotch Peers into the House. What they recommended was, that no further creation of Irish Peers should take place:—in Scotland no new creation could take place since the Union. In Ireland, however, it was deemed expedient that no fresh creation of Irish Peers should be made in the Irish Peerage, and accordingly the following Resolution was passed:—

"They (the Committee) are convinced that every addition to the Irish Peerage only increases and perpetuates the anomalous condition of that body. They would therefore trust that Her Majesty may be advised to renounce her Prerogative of creating Irish Peers, with a view to the modification of the 4th Article of the Union."

It was also suggested that it was desirable the Irish should, like the Scottish Representative Peers, be elected for life; while, on the other hand, a different party contended, like the Scottish, that it was better the Irish Peers should be elected for a Parliament only. The subject was so wide and went into so many branches that it might be difficult to deal with it by a single measure, but the first step was to ascertain what might be the views of his noble Relative on the matter. He therefore begged to ask the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Representative Peerage of Scotland and Ireland which sat last year, Whether he intends to bring forward any Motion to give effect to all or any of the recommendations of that Committee?

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he was exceedingly obliged to his noble Relative for putting to him this Question, as it gave him an opportunity of stating what was in his opinion the right method of dealing with the recommendations of the Committee. When the labours of the Committee in taking evidence were concluded, it was his duty to draft the Report and lay it before them. Some of the recommendations of the Committee related to matters of great importance, and might be the subject of enactment of the Legislature. Others were of minor importance, and not worth taking up, unless the subject were taken up as a whole. The major recommendations were three in number—first, that no more Irish Peers should be created; secondly, that there should be an increase in the number of Irish and Scotch Representative Peers; and thirdly, that there should be some mode of enabling the minority to select Representatives out of the whole body of Peers. The minor recommendations were—first, that there should be a new roll of Scotch Peers; secondly, that Scotch Peers should be allowed to sit in the House of Commons; thirdly, that Scotch Representative Peers should be elected for life; and fourthly, that Irish and Scotch Peers should be enabled to sit for any constituency in the United Kingdom. With regard to the recommendation that Scotch Peers should be enabled to sit in the House of Commons, two noble Lords who had taken the trouble to ascertain the opinion of the Scotch Peers on the subject found that the great majority of those Peers did not at all view the proposal with favour; and as it was not the object of the Committee to confer privileges on the Scotch Peers which they would look upon as an insult—or at any rate which they did not regard with favour—the Committee were ready to drop that recommendation. As to the three main recommendations, which might be made the subject of enactments, he would take, first, the increase of the number of Scotch and Irish Representative Peers. That recommendation was passed unanimously; but, as the accompanying recommendation in favour of the representation of the minority was rejected by a majority of three, it was impossible for any one thinking as he did on that matter to bring forward a proposal that the number of Representative Peers should be increased while the election was conducted under the present vicious system. He did not wish unduly to stigmatize the existing arrangements for electing Representative Peers; but he held that it would not be a benefit, but an evil to increase their number without some such safeguard as the cumulative vote. As to the recommendation that the Crown should not create any more Irish Peers there were several difficulties connected with it. The first was, that it was not very clear in what manner it should be carried out. But there was another objection of greater weight to his attempting to give effect to that object of the Committee. Last year a noble Lord opposite (Lord Inchiquin) brought it forward in that House in a speech which they all agreed was remarkable for its ability; but his Motion was negatived by the noble Duke the Leader on the Ministerial side, because such an extensive constitutional change ought not to be proposed except upon the responsibility of the Government of the day. He himself, therefore, had not thought it right to offer any recommendations to their Lordships as to the limitation of the Prerogative of the Crown with respect to the creation of Irish Peers. With regard to the entire Report of the Committee, it must be remembered that it comprised several clauses, and that on them there were eight closely contested divisions. It was, therefore, hardly possible for him, as Chairman, to bring forward, on his own responsibility, the recommendations of that Report as in any degree embodying the unanimous opinions of the Committee. He thanked his noble Relative for giving him the opportunity of making that statement.

LORD CARLINGFORD, as a Member of the Committee, said, that one part of the subject appeared to him to be of very great interest and importance. He referred to the proposal that the Crown should be humbly applied to with a view to the relinquishment of the Prerogative of creating Irish Peers. As an Irishman, perhaps he looked on the present state of that part of the law and of the Prerogative with more sensitive feelings than many of their Lordships; but he regarded it as a very serious anomaly, tending to keep up ideas of distinction and separation between the two countries which he was sure they were all anxious by every means to diminish and finally extinguish, and as maintaining a condition of inequality between those two great portions of the Realm that was highly inexpedient and mischievous. As things now stood, it was not even optional with the Crown to create or not to create Irish Peerages; the Crown was under a compulsion to keep up the Irish Peerages to a certain number—a most strange and undesirable state of matters. Sir Bernard Burke had proved before the Committee that the strongest objection was felt at the time of the Union by the Irish Peers who supported the Act of Union to the clause which was inserted for reserving to the Crown the power of creating Irish Peerages in future. The clause was carried solely by the influence of the Government of the day—not to meet any Irish views or wishes, but merely to maintain that branch of Ministerial patronage in this country. He did not think that any Irish susceptibilities would be wounded by the abandonment of that part of the Prerogative, and, he believed, that the final closing of the Irish Peerage would be a real benefit to the country.

EARL GREY contended that the system of election of the Scotch and Irish Peers to that House was unsound, and that the creation of more Irish Peers would be an unmixed evil. Looking at the recommendations of the Committee, he was not surprised that the noble Chairman had declined to take any steps in reference to them. On the contrary, the noble Earl had exercised a wise discretion in not doing so. It was, however, the duty of the Government to bring the subject before the House, and to prevent, if possible, any further complication in reference to it.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE understood his noble Friend to say that though the Report recommended that the Scotch Peers not in that House should be placed on the same footing as the Irish Peers not in that House, yet that the opinions expressed by the Scotch Peers themselves were to the effect that they did not desire it. Now, he (the Earl of Airlie) had himself proposed to embody that recommendation in the Report; but there was such a strong opinion in the Committee against his proposition that he did not venture to press it. He hoped that some day the Scotch Peers would be in a better frame of mind on that point.

ARMY (INDIA)—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD STRATHNAIRN moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of any Correspondence now in the India Office between the Government of India and the India Office relating to the effects of competitive examination and the present system of education for first commissions and appointments in India.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was sorry that he could not consent to the Motion, for the good reason that the correspondence was still going on, and it would be quite irregular to lay upon the Table part of an incomplete correspondence.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he should be glad if the noble Duke would give their Lordships some information upon this important subject, as many persons were anxious to know whether the men appointed under the present system of competitive examination did their work better in India than those appointed under the old system.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, that he must express his surprise and regret that he should now for the third time be refused Papers relating to a question which was the subject of general complaint—the system of civil competitive examination as a qualification of candidates for first commissions in the Army. The first excuse was that the Civil Commissioners declined to give the Papers he moved for for reasons which were unintelligible. He was not aware that the Civil Commissioners of Education had a right to refuse a Member of their Lordships' House Papers which would throw light on the important question whether the present system of education, which placed in the hands of Civil Examiners the extraordinary power, not known in any other Army, of admitting military candidates into the service of their Sovereign and their country, or of disqualifying them for it, was not a great anomaly and a great mistake. Nothing could be more important than the proper and efficient officering of our Army, especially in the times in which we lived, when two great military Powers were, perfectly armed and organized, contemplating a war of retaliation, which might upset the balance of power and the rights in which this country was so much interested.

LORD LAWRENCE assured their Lordships that we did not get better men in India for the Civil Service at any period within his recollection than we obtained under the competitive system. He might not be considered to be a competent judge of the merits or qualifications of young officers who went out in the military service, but he did not know that those who went out under the competitive system were inferior to those under the old or patronage system. They appeared to him to be all of the same class socially—the only difference between the two systems being that under the competitive system we insured a certain qualification and intellectual culture in our officers, which we were not certain to secure under the other system. He felt it his duty to bear testimony to the competitive system as on the whole superior to the old or patronage system.

NEW PEER.

The Earl of Dalhousie of that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland, having been created Baron Ramsay of the United Kingdom—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN EXPEDITION TO HISSAR.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has any information as to the Russian expedition to Hissar; and if he knows whether the men of science named for it are to be accompanied by a military escort?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the only information which had been received at the Foreign Office as to a Russian scientific expedition to Hissar was contained in an extract from The Turkestan Gazette, which he did not think would be intelligible to the House without a map. He would, however, take measures to have it published. He had heard nothing as to the expedition being accompanied by a military escort, but he thought that if an expedition of the kind had started into a country which might be said to be unknown, and the natives of which were, most probably, extremely rough and barbarous, it was very likely to be accompanied by a military escort.

AUDIT OF ARMY AND NAVY ACCOUNTS. QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Departmental Committee recommended by the Select Committee of Public Accounts, to report upon the expediency of extending the system of an independent audit to the accounts of our Army and Navy expenditure, was appointed; and, if so, when; and, whether that Committee has made any Report; and, if so, if he has any objection to lay said Report upon the Table?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the Committee to which the hon. Member for Hackney refers was appointed under the superintendence of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and made some of its inquiries. Various circumstances, however, occurred to delay it, and no Report has yet been presented. I have had the subject under consideration, and I trust that I shall be able to suggest a satisfactory solution of the Question. For that purpose I propose at my earliest leisure—most probably at the end of the Session—to resume and complete the inquiry, and the Report which we shall present will, of course, be communicated to the Departments concerned and submitted to Parliament.

WEST INDIES—ISLAND OF ST. VINCENT.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether a Petition was received at the Colonial Office from the island of St. Vincent, dated April 1874, signed by all the non-official members of the Executive Council and of the Legislative Assembly of the Colony, by every landed proprietor, planter, and estate agent, and by every mercantile firm in the island (with one exception), in which it is stated that the taxation of the Colony is excessive, and beyond what is needed for its due administration, and that, owing to the depressed state of West Indian produce, if the taxation be not diminished, the necessary result must be that the majority of the estates in the island will cease to be cultivated; whether any acknowledgment or reply has been sent to that Petition; whether the attention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies has been called to the apparent discrepancy between the above statements, made by so large a majority of the inhabitants of St. Vincent, and those contained in the published Despatch of Administrator Laborde, dated April 16th, 1873, in which he states, with reference to the Colony of St. Vincent, that "there is nothing to complain of," and "that the people are quiet and contented;" whether Mr. Laborde has been asked for any explanation of this apparent discrepancy; and, whether the newly appointed Lieutenant Governor of St. Vincent has been directed to inquire into the grievances alleged by the inhabitants, with a view to the adoption of remedial measures?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, a Petition of the nature referred to by the hon. Gentleman was received at the time stated in the Question. Both before and since its receipt the financial condition of the island and the incidence of taxation have received the anxious consideration of my noble Friend the Secretary of State, and on the appointment of the new Lieutenant Governor (Mr. Dundas) his especial attention was directed to these subjects. With reference to the other points alluded to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman, as active steps were being taken and communications made to the Lieutenant Governor, and through him to the various persons in the Colony who were interested in these matters, it was not considered necessary to enter any further into the matter. I am happy to be able to state, in conclusion, that Mr. Dundas has already proposed, with the concurrence of the elective Members, a revised scheme of taxation, which he believes to be in accordance with the wishes of the community, and which promises to afford general satisfaction, and this scheme has received the approval of the Secretary of State.

WATERFORD HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS—AUDIT OF ACCOUNTS.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. R. POWER, THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the accounts of the Waterford Harbour Commissioners were not audited by the Controller and Auditor General, for the reason that they neither came within the class of accounts contemplated under the Act, nor had any application for such an audit been made. It was not the present intention of the Treasury to give any further directions on the subject.

ARMY—NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, When he hopes to be able to state to the House the general outlines of his scheme for the improvement of the position of Non-Commissioned Officers?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had prepared certain suggestions and estimates, which he intended to lay before Parliament, for the improvement of the condition of non-commissioned officers. Owing to certain unavoidable causes, a greater delay than he anticipated had arisen in bringing the question before the House, and he was quite unable to say when he should be able to proceed in the matter.

IRELAND—THE DUBLIN POLICE.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to certain paragraphs in the Dublin daily papers relative to the arrest of some gentlemen by the police on a charge of injuring iron railings in Sackville Street (which the prisoners declared they were only "straightening") at three o'clock in the morning, when coming from their club, the acting Police Inspector who received the charge at the police station directing them to be retained till morning; whether it is true that amongst the friends who during the night offered themselves as bail for the accused, was the Commissioner of Police, the superior officer of the Inspector in question; whether the newspapers are correct in stating that the Inspector had been "reduced" by the Commissioner in consequence of this incident; and, whether, having regard to the desirability of the officers and men of the police force discharging their duties in an impartial and independent manner, the Government will recommend the Chief Commissioner of Police in future to leave the bailing of night prisoners arrested by the police to some other friends of the accused?

MR. MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, in reply, said, he took no notice of certain paragraphs referring to the matter in question, because he did not think they deserved attention. It was not true that the Chief Commissioner of Police offered himself as bail for the accused. There would have been no necessity for his doing so, because, both as Chief Commissioner and as a magistrate, he might have discharged the defendants from custody if he had thought fit to do so. The case went before a magistrate the following morning, and was dismissed, and the police-sergeant who was acting as night Inspector at the time these gentlemen were arrested was reduced to his former grade of sergeant, on account of the want of discretion which he displayed in detaining persons who were perfectly well known to him, and not allowing them to be released upon bail.

Mr. J. Lowther

THE FIJI ISLANDS—EPIDEMIC OF MEASLES.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the fatal epidemic of measles, which is reported to have committed such havoc in the Fiji Islands, is to be attributed to any relaxation of the rigid precautions which usually prevail in Her Majesty's ships?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he was unable to give his right hon. and gallant Friend any information on the subject. A Report had been called for, but it had not yet been received.

ARMY—BRIGADE DEPOT AT WARLEY.
QUESTION.

COLONEL GILPIN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would state to the House what is the present strength of the several Brigade Depots at Warley in Essex, in officers and men, particularly detailing the Staff, Commissioned and non-Commissioned; and, whether it is true there are three Paymasters stationed there, and if so, what are their functions?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the strength of the three Brigade Depôts at Warley is as follows:—Staff, 4 of the 44th, 3 of the 49th, 4 of the 50th—total, 11; officers, 11 of the 44th, 8 of the 49th, 9 of the 50th—total, 28; sergeants, 17 of the 44th, 16 of the 49th, 13 of the 50th—total, 46; drummers, 4 of the 44th, 4 of the 49th, 4 of the 50th—total, 12; rank and file, 149 of the 44th, 111 of the 49th, 94 of the 50th—total, 354; making a total of 185 of the 44th, 142 of the 49th, 124 of the 50th—grand total, 451. It is true that there are at present three Paymasters there. Their duties are to pay the men and Staff of the Brigade and of the two Depôts attached to each, and as the Brigade system is more and more developed, they will pay the Auxiliary Forces and Pensioners and all local services in each sub-district. Two of the three Brigade Depôts are only temporarily at Warley, having been moved there from Woolwich in consequence of the sickness at the latter station. The fact of there being three Paymasters at Warley arises from the state of transition of the Depot generally, and is unavoidable. The War Department were to dismiss Paymasters merely because three Depôts happen to be temporarily together on account of unforeseen circumstances such as have happened in this case.

IRELAND—HARBOUR OF ARDGLASS.
QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will lay on the Table of the House the Documents relating to the Grant of Money made to the Harbour of Ardglass, in order to explain the intentions of Government in respect to grants of public money to assist in improving Harbours in Scotland?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, there were no documents in the Board of Trade referring to the grant.

INDIA—DISPUTES WITH BURMAH.
QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government will at once communicate to the House any information relative to the complaints, of whatever kind, made by the Government of India against the King of Burmah, together with a Copy of the instructions given to Sir Douglas Forsyth, Her Majesty's special Envoy to the Burmese Court?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, there will be no objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence relating to the differences which have from time to time arisen between the King of Burmah and the Indian Government. Sir Douglas Forsyth has been sent upon a special mission to Mandalay to facilitate an amicable settlement of their differences. No course, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, would be more likely to frustrate that object than to make public the special instructions upon which Sir Douglas Forsyth has orders to act, and therefore, I am afraid I must decline to furnish the hon. Gentleman with them.

INLAND REVENUE—APPOINTMENT OF SIR ALFRED SLADE.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Morning Post" of the 18th instant, that Sir Alfred Slade has been appointed to the Office of Receiver-General of the Inland Revenue?

MR. DISRAELI: It is quite true, Sir, that Sir Alfred Slade has been appointed to that office.

MR. DILLWYN: I beg to give Notice that I shall call attention to the subject on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply on Friday next.

POST OFFICE—THE WEST INDIA MAIL.
QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON asked the Postmaster General, If he will make arrangements for the Royal Mail Steamers to the West Indies to call for letters at Plymouth on the outward voyage on the 3rd and 18th of the month, so as to increase the interval between the arrival and departure of the mails, and obviate the inconvenience occasioned not only to merchants in London, but also in Liverpool, Manchester, and the whole of Scotland, by the short time now allowed for replying to letters; and, whether he will make other arrangements, such as offering a premium for increased speed (as in the previous contract) likely to effect the same object?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he could not adopt the suggestion, as he thought that whatever advantages might be likely to arise from such an arrangement, they would be more than counterbalanced by disadvantages. There was not any offer of premiums for increased speed in the contract.

PUBLIC HEALTH—SANITARY CONDITION OF OXFORD.—QUESTION.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, who had a Notice on the Paper, to ask the honourable Member for Barnstaple, Whether, having charged the authorities of Oxford with "gross and wilful neglect" to the sanitary condition of that place, he will at once place upon the Paper the Resolution which he proposes to move, that they may become acquainted with the specific charge made against them, said, that as he understood that that hon. Member had withdrawn his Notice, he (Mr. Hardy) did not think it necessary to put to him the Question he had placed on the Paper.

MR. T. CAVE said, he was almost sorry that the right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn his Question, especially as there was another immediately following it to be put by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) relating to the same subject. Immediately on the appearance of his (Mr. T. Cave's) Notice of Motion, he received so many communications from various parties interested in the City of Oxford, and especially from one of the authorities of one of the principal Colleges, that he thought it his duty to make a fuller investigation into the matters referred to in that Notice of Motion before bringing it under the consideration of the House, and in consequence of that he had removed it from the Paper under the best advice he could obtain in that House. He hoped at an early day to be able to state to the right hon. Gentleman on what day and in what mode he would bring the subject before the House.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK PERKINS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that scarlet fever has broken out amongst the Soldiers of the Second Life Guards now stationed at Knightsbridge Barracks, and not only in the barracks but in the lodging-houses in the vicinity where many of the married men are located; and, whether, in view of this serious state of things, combined with the alleged unsanitary state of the barracks, he will consider the desirability of removing the barracks to a less densely populated locality?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, on the 14th instant the medical authorities reported that since the 26th of May, the date of the first case, three cases of scarlatina had occurred among the men and three among the children living in barracks, and three among the children living outside the barracks. On the 17th instant one trooper was admitted into hospital with symptoms of a mild attack of scarlatina. All the cases have been of mild type, and nearly all are convalescent. In reporting the case on the 17th instant, the Surgeon Major 2nd Life Guards said—

"This is the only case I have had among the men since the 3rd instant, and I have no fresh cases to report among the women or children living in or out of barracks."

With regard to the alleged unsanitary state of the barracks, judging from the Sanitary Reports of the last three years, it would not appear that Knightsbridge Barracks are in an unsanitary state as compared with other barracks in general. The annual ratio of admissions per 1,000 of the Household Cavalry is below that of other arms of the service generally. The result of a comparison between Knightsbridge and Regent's Park Barracks is much in favour of the former, if the proportion of illness from fevers and infectious diseases depending on unsanitary conditions of dwellings be alone taken. Scarlet fever has been, it is believed, prevalent in the neighbourhood of the barracks previous to the 2nd Life Guards coming there, and so far from bringing it, they had found it there.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT (1873) AMENDMENT BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. LOPES asked the Lord Advocate, in the absence of Mr. Attorney General, When (having regard to the near approach of the Circuits, and the consequent absence of many legal Members) the Committee on the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill will be taken?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, he was unable to state on what day the Committee would be taken. The convenience of legal Gentlemen would be consulted with reference to the day when the Bill would be set down for going into Committee.

MR. LOPES said, the answer not being specific, he would repeat his Question on Friday next.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the Postmaster General, Whether any steps are being taken to re-establish the telegraphic communication, which has been interrupted for some time, between England and the Channel Islands; and, if so, how soon it is expected the telegraph will be in working order?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that steps had been taken to re-establish the communication referred to. A cable heavier and more durable than the former one was now being manufactured, and as soon as it was completed it would be laid. It would probably be finished about the end of next month, when the communication with the Channel Islands would be restored.

IRELAND—REMOVAL OF LUNATICS.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MOORE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the following statement made by Dr. Garner in his annual report to the governors of the Clonmel District Lunatic Asylum:—

"Patients are often conveyed to the asylum under the provisions of the Act 30 and 31 Vic., c. 118, guarded by an armed escort, generally handcuffed, and as often as not bound hand and foot. In one case the unhappy patient, in addition to his bonds, arrived enveloped in a bag reaching up to his throat. In this plight he had travelled on a car nearly 40 miles. In another—that of a puerperal maniac—the restraining cords cut deeply into her wrists and ankles; the chances of recovery are thus, I need not say, heavily weighted. More than two-thirds of the admissions are under the authority of this statute, so that the necessity of a more decorous mode of conveyance is all the more pressing;"

and, whether he will issue stringent orders to the police to avoid all unnecessary suffering to such patients?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the police had already received orders to avoid all unnecessary suffering to patients conveyed to lunatic asylums in Ireland. He had made inquiries of the Inspector General of Constabulary, but did not find that any complaint had been made to him of the improper conduct of the police of Tipperary in this respect; nor did he find that any statement had been received by the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums similar to that which, according to the hon. Member, was made by Dr. Garner in his annual report to the governors of the Clonmel District Lunatic Asylum. This statement was, however, of so serious a nature that he would cause inquiry to be made in regard to it, and he should be happy to communicate to the hon. Member the result of the investigation.

CRIMINAL LAW—TREATMENT OF CONVICTS—PORTLAND AND CHATHAM.

QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has any communication to make to the House with reference to the recent death of a convict in Portland prison, and the declaration of the jury at the inquest accusing the assistant medical officer of unkind treatment of the deceased; and, if it is true that a military prisoner named O'Brien, now undergoing sentence of penal servitude for life at Chatham, has been in chains since Christmas, or at any time since his conviction, and, if so, for how long a period; and if it is also true that his mother went a few days since to see him, but, after having been brought to Chatham, was told her son had forfeited his right to a visit and had to come away without seeing him?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that in consequence of the verdict of a coroner's jury he ordered a special inquiry to be instituted into the conduct of the assistant medical officer at Portland prison with reference to the recent death of a convict there. That inquiry was conducted by persons well qualified to form a correct judgment—namely, Dr. Guy, Dr. Bristowe, and Captain Stockwell. If the hon. Member would move for a Return of their report, he (Mr. Cross) should have no objection to place it on the Table of the House; but at present he would only refer to the concluding portion of it in which they stated that having taken all the facts of the case into consideration, they had no alternative but to acquit Dr. Bernard of the charge of want of skill, want of attention, and want of substantial kindness. At the same time, they said it appeared from the evidence that he had exhibited a certain abruptness and brusqueness of manner which would go far to explain the convict's dislike to him. It was true that a military prisoner named O'Brien, now undergoing sentence of penal servitude for life at Chatham, was put in chains in the middle of last year. On the 29th of June, 1874, he was discovered to have made a hole in the wall of his cell with a view to effecting his escape. For this offence he was, according to the rules of the prison, placed in light chains for six months. In consequence, also, of this misconduct he was placed in another class of prisoners and his right to see his friends was curtailed. It was for this reason, and for this reason alone, that when his mother went to see him she was told her son had forfeited his right to a visit, and she had to go away from Chatham without seeing him.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that on an early day he would put another Question on the same subject.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, in reference to questions on the same subject on July 10th of last year and February 18th of this year, Whether any decision has yet been arrived at by him in regard to the new rules affecting the leave of those uncovenanted civil servants in India whose cases have remained undecided since last year; and, if not, what has become of the list of uncovenanted civil servants in Bengal which accompanied a despatch from the Government of India, dated May 26th, 1874, and upon whose cases a decision was deferred until the receipt of further information from that Government, while the list for the province of Oudh was accepted by him, and the officers mentioned in it were admitted, two years ago, to the benefit of the new rules?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, no decision has at present been arrived at by the Secretary of State regarding the application referred to in the Question of the hon. Member. The subject is one upon which it is very difficult for the Secretary of State to make any great change without having before him a statement of the definite opinion of the Government of India. No such statement has at present been received, but a despatch upon the subject will shortly be sent out.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMEND.

MENT (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 116.]

(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck,

Mr. William Henry Smith.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 12 (Charges against officers.)

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 30, to leave out the words "an assessor," and insert the words "two or more."—(Mr. Norwood.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'an assessor' stand part of the clause."

Mr. O'Connor Power

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would cause unnecessary expense to appoint two assessors in every case. Assessors were not always easily to be found; besides, it was useless to have two assessors, if the inquiry was such that it could be, and sometimes would be better, carried on with one. Two might always be appointed wherever necessary.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON thought a tribunal of such importance ought to have the advantage of more than one assessor, if its decisions were to have any weight. He could not accept the ground of expense as an excuse for depriving officers of the Mercantile Marine of the consideration they were entitled to when their conduct was called in question. He hoped the hon. Member for Hull would press his Amendment, and with every desire to support the Government in passing the Bill, he would support the hon. Member if he stood by his Amendment.

LORD ESLINGTON observed, that there was nothing in the clause which would prevent there being two or three assessors, whilst it would ensure that there should be only one in cases in which there was no necessity for more.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, it was much ado about nothing. Cases where a man's personal liberty was involved were decided by one magistrate; and in this particular instance the point generally was not whether the certificate ought to have been suspended, but whether it ought ever to have been granted. In his opinion, the clause as it stood was amply sufficient for all purposes.

MR. LOPES thought that the clause as it stood would meet every purpose that was required; whilst the Amendment would render it necessary to have two assessors, even in small and trifling cases where they were not required.

MR. NORWOOD said, that the officers of the Merchant Service attached very great importance to this Amendment; because upon the result of these inquiries might depend their character and their means of livelihood. They would, however, be satisfied if the person whose conduct was in question was allowed the option of demanding a second assessor. Two assessors were required in the comparatively trifling cases which were brought before County Courts. He did not wish to press his Amendment unduly on the House, but he did think that for the sake of a £10 note a second auditor ought not to be refused.

MR. HAMOND moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, sub-section 3, line 30, to leave out "of such skill and knowledge," and insert, "but who shall have no power to vote." The judgment should be that of the Court, the duty of the assessors being ended when the report was made.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY pointed out that that was already the case, the assessors being merely the advisers and assistants of the Judge. He was not aware of any cases in which they did vote or could vote.

MR. LOPES regarded it as quite clear that assessors had no power to vote.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 31, after "knowledge" to insert—

"Whose qualification shall be at least twenty years' service at sea, five years of that time in a sailing vessel, and ten years as master in either steam or sailing ships in the British Merchant Service; and in all cases of a steam vessel being the subject of inquiry, one of the assessors shall have been ten years master of a steamship."

The hon. and learned Member said, he did not in that Amendment go beyond the expressed intention of the Government, that the persons called upon to judge of the management of a merchant ship should be persons of nautical skill and of the necessary experience. The Committee however, were not told what their qualifications were to be; the only thing they were told was that the persons to be appointed should be chosen by the Judge of the Court of Admiralty. He held that some indication of the kind of persons to be appointed should be given, for the matter was too important to be left to the discretion of a Judge. An officer of the Royal Navy would be tried by a court-martial—that was, by his peers; but there was no process of that kind in the Merchant Service. Hitherto assessors had been selected from among officers in the Royal Navy, though they had no special acquaintance with the Merchant Service. Officers in that service felt very sore at this, and they feared that this system might still continue. The kind of skill to be met with in naval officers was not the kind of skill necessary for conducting a judicial inquiry in the case of merchant vessels. The officers of the Merchant Service, therefore, demanded as a matter of fairness that they should be tried by persons who had had the same nautical experience as themselves and in vessels of the same class. The Amendment he proposed laid down, he ventured to suggest, a fair qualification for the assessors, but he was ready to allow it to be modified.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the Amendment had arisen in an oversensitive jealousy on the part of the Merchant Service towards the officers of the Royal Navy. And yet he did not suppose anyone would have the officers of the Royal Navy altogether excluded from acting as assessors in any case. What, then, was the use of the Amendment? Some authority must be appointed to name the assessors, and it was thought that the High Court of Admiralty would be the best, instead of as at present the Board of Trade, which was the prosecutor. Suppose a boiler had burst, and that an engineer was wanted as assessor, would it be well to restrict the choice in the manner proposed by the Amendment—that the engineer must have been 20 years at sea, five in a sailing vessel? As the clause now stood, the Court could elect the fittest assessors for each particular case.

LORD ESLINGTON did not agree with his right hon. Friend that this sensitiveness on the part of the Merchant Service had arisen from jealousy of the officers of the Navy. It arose rather from the circumstance that this was a matter on which their livelihood depended. He was of opinion, however, that if unnecessary restrictions on the choice of assessors were imposed, the object in view would be defeated, because competent men were not to be obtained every day.

MR. GOURLEY supported the Amendment, as he doubted whether naval officers would always have that practical knowledge and intimate acquaintance with the coast where the accident to be inquired into might have occurred, that would qualify them to act as assessors.

MR. MAC IVER also supported the Amendment. These Courts of Inquiry were often a scandal to justice. He did not believe there was any jealousy on the part of the Mercantile Marine with respect to officers of the Royal Navy; but he thought the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member was a fair and reasonable one, inasmuch as the object was to secure that there should be on the tribunal at least one assessor, who was practically acquainted with the working of the Mercantile Marine. There was a strong feeling against placing the decision of many important questions in the hands of a single stipendiary magistrate, who might have little or no experience, assisted by an assessor who, however able in other respects, knew nothing of the Mercantile Marine. He earnestly hoped the President of the Board of Trade would in some way modify the clause, so as to meet the very general feeling which prevailed on the subject.

MR. T. E. SMITH hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to the acceptance of at least a portion of the Amendment, and not leave the decision of important questions affecting the Mercantile Marine to naval officers only. The Mercantile Marine had a right to some distinct representation in the Court. Something should be done to give them confidence in it. He suggested that at least one of the assessors should belong to the Merchant Navy. That would, he thought, go far to meet the justice of the case. Officers of the Royal Navy had not always a knowledge of the particular circumstances under which the casualties to be investigated sometimes arose.

MR. LOPES could not understand why any limitations should be placed on the exercise of the functions of the Chief Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in appointing assessors. No such interference existed in the case of the Home Secretary, who had to appoint stipendiary magistrates almost every day. He hoped the clause would be agreed to as it stood in this respect.

SIR ANDREW LUSK hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. He did not know where the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. MacIver) was born and bred that he should say that the way justice was administered in this country was scandalous. After all, suspension of a certificated officer was not so great a loss as was imagined, for very often a good ship was waiting for the person suspended when the time of suspension expired. He would rather have a clever young man with six than an old woman with 60 years' experience for surveyor or assessor.

MR. TORR said, what was wanted was a good counsellor to assist the Judge. He would suggest the omission of the terms of service from the Amendment, so as to allow the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, as far as practicable, to select from persons who had acquired a knowledge of and concerning the Mercantile Marine.

MR. D. JENKINS was in favour of one of the assessors being connected with the Mercantile Marine. He wished to point out that the clause made no provision for the appointment of an assessor with a knowledge of steam sailing in cases relating to steamers.

MR. HENLEY said, he was in favour of the appointment of a tribunal in which the Mercantile Marine would have confidence. He did not think that would be the case here. An officer of the Royal Navy might be as good a sailor as ever went to sea, but he had no practical knowledge of the particular circumstances he might be called upon to decide. He would, therefore, recommend his right hon. Friend to reconsider the subject, and amend the clause in such a way as to give some guarantee that assessors appointed should really have practical experience in the matters which would be submitted for their judgment and decision.

MR. E. J. REED said, he objected to the Amendment that whereas the clause did not exclude engineer officers the Amendment did.

MR. BENTINCK condemned the Amendment on the ground that as drawn it would defeat its own object. By it a really competent man might be excluded if his period of service did not come up to the prescribed limit.

MR. NORWOOD observed, that the word "suspension" of certificate in the existing Acts had been altered in the clause to "cancelled," and therefore it was desirable as officers of the Merchant Service attributed great importance to the formation of the tribunal, to be careful how it was constituted. Officers of the Royal Navy would not be able in many cases to comprehend multitudes masters of vessels might and he distinctly objected assessors.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the High Court of Admiralty would be instructed by the Board of Trade as to the class of men to be selected as assessors, according to the nature of the investigation. While he could not accept the Amendment as it stood, he would undertake that when the Report was brought up it should be so far amended as to give the High Court of Admiralty the power to appoint in all cases at least one assessor connected with the Mercantile Marine.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, in that case he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. NORWOOD moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 32, to leave out "High," and insert "Local." He did so with the object of giving the appointment of assessors to local Judges of the Admiralty. It would also secure immediate inquiries, carried on at a small cost, by persons whose local knowledge would be valuable.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought it was desirable to carry out as far as possible the object of the Bill, which was to make the appointment of assessors as independent as possible, and especially to avoid appointments in localities with which the parties to cases for inquiry were connected.

MR. T. E. SMITH expressed a hope that the Amendment would not be pressed, thinking that it would be almost impossible to get local men as assessors who had not some connection with the parties to the cases under investigation.

MR. LOPES thought it would be much better that these appointments should rest with the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty, and then persons so appointed would be above suspicion.

Amendment negatived.

MR. HERSCHELL (for Mr. RATHBONE) moved an Amendment to the effect that assessors in a local inquiry should not be chosen from among the assessors of the High Court of Admiralty, the object being to prevent assessors of the High Court having to sit there in cases which they had already heard.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CHARLEY moved, as an Amendment, that the list of assessors of the High Court should be advertised in The London Gazette. It was important that the panel selected by the Court of Admiralty to try these cases should be made public.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that would possibly preclude the appointment of the best man for a particular case if he were not in the advertised list.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HERSCHELL pointed out that no provision was made for the appointment of assessors in a case in which proceedings were taken by persons independently of the Board of Trade.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that hitherto proceedings had been taken, and probably would continue to be taken, through the Board of Trade.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the clause clearly contemplated independent action.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he would look into the matter, and bring up words to make it clear.

MR. NORWOOD said, it ought to be made clear that no proceedings could be taken except through the Board of Trade.

MR. CHARLEY moved an Amendment to the effect that six assessors should be chosen by ballot from a list, and that each party should strike out the names of two, the remaining names to be the assessors to assist on the hearing of the complaint. He said that this was the system at present in force in the Court of passage, at Liverpool, which was possessed of Admiralty jurisdiction. His object was to get an impartial tribunal, and the striking out of the names was in the nature of a challenge, only more convenient.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. RATHBONE moved, in page 6, line 29, after "made" to insert—

"Where the inquiry relates to a collision no assessor who shall aid the Court shall afterwards assist the High Court of Admiralty in hearing a case relating to the same."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it referred to circumstances which did not arise, as all cases of collision would ordinarily go before the High Court of Admiralty, and not be heard by local Courts. He would suggest to the hon. Member for Liverpool that it would be well to bring his proposal forward when the Committee came to consider the 47th clause, which related to inquiries as to wrecks.

MR. GORST thought the Amendment was entirely beyond the scope of the Bill.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 149; Noes 222: Majority 73.

MR. CHARLEY moved an Amendment giving the person charged power of requiring that he should be tried by a jury instead of by assessors. A similar power was given to the accused in the Labour Bills of the Home Secretary.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that there was a general willingness in the Mercantile Navy to accept, as the best tribunal, the stipendiary magistrate or County Court Judge, assisted by two assessors. One of the great objects in view was to prevent cases of this kind being investigated by those who had local interests, and upon whom local prejudices and influences might be brought to bear, as would be the case with a jury.

MR. LOPES thought the tribunal provided by the Bill was an excellent one, whereas a jury of shopkeepers, however estimable they might be, would be wholly unfitted to try questions of this kind.

MR. D. JENKINS could hardly think the hon. and learned Member for Salford was serious in making the present proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, as an Amendment, in page 7, line 6, to insert the words "or suspended" after "cancelled." Under the existing law the Board of Trade had power to suspend an officer's certificate as well as to cancel it, and suspension was the course pursued in the great majority of cases. This Bill proposed to get rid of the power of suspending certificates, and only empowered the Court of Inquiry to cancel them. Such a provision would often prevent the Court of Inquiry from doing justice; and, moreover, it did not appear what would be the status of a man whose certificate had been cancelled, and who might apply for another certificate after a certain lapse of time.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY opposed the Amendment, and observed that if an officer's certificate was suspended for incompetency, it was surely absurd that he should at the end of the period of inaction, when he would probably be more incompetent still, receive it back again. He proposed, however, to accept an Amendment of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond), giving power to the Board of Trade to qualify the order by directing the defendant to apply at the time specified to be examined for a certificate of the same class as that cancelled, or to direct a certificate of a lower grade to be substituted for the one so cancelled. In this way the interval would be spent in practice, and the lost certificate regained on proof of competency.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that the change proposed by the Bill was recommended by the legal advisers of the Board of Trade, in their evidence before the Royal Commission.

MR. BENTINCK said, a distinction ought to be drawn in cases where the certificate was cancelled for incompetency and where it was cancelled for misconduct.

MR. BATES said, a captain who happened to get too much to drink when not on duty ought not to have his certificate cancelled; but if he got drunk on board his ship, or while on duty, not only ought his certificate to be cancelled, but he should not be able to get another.

MR. A. W. PEEL said, he did not know why this power of suspension had been left out of the Bill.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, drunkenness in command of a ship was incompetency, and habitual drunkenness would be distinct proof of a captain's unfitness to command a ship.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HAMOND moved, as an Amendment, in page 7, sub-section 5, line 7, are out all after "fit," to end of section, and insert—

y, if it thinks fit, qualify such order so that the defendant may at the ex- piration of a certain time to be then and there specified, apply to be examined for a certificate of the same class as that so cancelled, or may direct a certificate of a lower grade to be there named to be substituted for that so cancelled."

If the Amendment were adopted, the Court would have power to award different grades of punishment for different classes of offences, and the Court would in certain cases have power to punish instead of the Board of Trade.

MR. T. E. SMITH, with reference to the proposed Amendment, said, he would move the omission of the words "to be examined," in justice to a large class who were entitled to certificates without examination.

Motion agreed to.

Words struck out.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. HAMOND moved to leave out sub-section 8 in order to insert—

"The Board of Trade may regrant a fresh certificate to any person whose certificate has been cancelled, provided such person undergoes a further examination to qualify him for the same, and that a period of not less than twelve months has elapsed since the cancellation of his certificate and the period of his undergoing such examination."

As the sub-section stood it gave the Board of Trade unlimited power over the decision of the Court without further inquiry.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the eighth sub-section must certainly stand. The clause was a mere repetition of the existing law.

MR. NORWOOD said, it appeared to him that the sub-section was perfectly right, and without the power it contained much injustice might be done.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. NORWOOD moved an Amendment to the effect that the conduct of the inquiry and the evidence given before the Court should be as nearly as possible subject to and according to the laws of evidence and procedure in civil cases. At present the assessors "broke in" and asked questions which they had no right to put, whereby the course of justice was impeded.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the object which the hon. Member desired to secure had already been effected. The inquiry must be held in England before a stipendiary or metropolitan magistrate, and it would be in the nature of a civil proceeding.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the Bill separated the inquiry into two parts—that which referred to the loss of the vessel, and next as to the conduct of the officer. What he feared was that the latter inquiry would be too strictly legal, and that the officer would not himself be allowed to give evidence. It was very desirable that the officers should submit themselves to examination.

MR. HERSCHELL also doubted whether a person charged with drunkenness or incompetence, for instance, could give evidence. It would be more in the nature of a criminal than a civil proceeding.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL believed that these were all of the nature of civil proceedings, and that the officers concerned would in all cases have the right to be examined. If it were not so, the Bill would require to be amended. He would look into the matter, and see whether any Amendment was necessary.

MR. NORWOOD said, he was satisfied with that assurance, and would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WILSON moved an Amendment to provide for the payment, by the Board of Trade, of the defendant's costs in case the charge made against him proved to be untrue.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL reminded the hon. Member that the Courts had full power to make such an award. If the Board of Trade was the complainant that body would have to pay the costs.

Amendment by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHARLEY moved, in page 7, at the end of sub-section 8, to add—

"9. No party other than the Board of Trade or the owner of any ship shall be at liberty to make any such complaint, unless he shall have previously given security to the satisfaction of the court to which such complaint is made to answer the costs thereof."

His object was to prevent frivolous prosecutions, which were often made out of mere spite.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT did not think that the Amendment was necessary, for, as he understood, though complaints might come from other parties, the Board of Trade would be the sole promoter of proceedings.

LORD ESLINGTON remarked that if it were laid down that the Board of Trade or the owner were the only parties at liberty to make complaints, a great many cases which might be known to sailors only would be excluded.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL observed, that the Amendment did not say that no one, with certain exceptions, should make a complaint, but that no one should do so without giving security for costs. He did not see, if this Amendment should be accepted by his right hon. Friend, why the owner of a vessel should be exempted.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he had no desire to prevent any person from making a complaint if he had grounds for doing so, but he thought it would be better not to press the Amendment.

MR. GORST said, that in the case of a sailor the Summary Jurisdiction Act would apply, and he would be able to go before a magistrate. To make the Board of Trade the prosecutor, considerable amendment must be introduced into the clause.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that by the clause it was competent for any person to prefer a complaint without first applying to the Board of Trade.

MR. CHARLEY said, the object of the Amendment was to meet cases where there would not be time to apply to the Board of Trade, and thereby prevent delay. He had no objection to leave out the words "owners of ships;" but he would persevere with it in its amended form. There was no doubt whatever that great hardship would be inflicted by leaving the clause as it stood. He himself knew a case where the captain of a ship was put to an expense of £30, caused by a vexatious prosecution brought by a sailor.

MR. CHILDERS wished to have something definite inserted in the clause to show whether proceedings were to be confined to the Board of Trade or not.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, it was seldom or ever that proceedings had been taken in the past, excepting by the Board of Trade, and it had, therefore, not been thought necessary to insert any provision against frivolous complaints by individuals.

MR. CHILDERS was not satisfied with the experience of the past as a guarantee against anything that might take place in the future. He thought it should be put beyond doubt whether the whole proceeding might not be taken by any private person or whether it could only be taken by the Board of Trade. There should be no ambiguity on that point.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, as the clause now stood, no doubt, a private person might take proceedings; but, owing to the Amendment made by the hon. and learned Member for Salford in the earlier part of the clause, this clause would require to be remodelled, which might be done on the Report.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, before parting with the clause, wished to have some distinct understanding as to the nature of the alteration to be made—whether it would throw open the complaint to all the world or confine it to the Board of Trade. For his own part, he preferred the latter.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL reminded hon. Members that the question had already been discussed in a fuller Committee than there was at present—namely, on the proposal of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond) to confine complaints to the Board of Trade. The Committee was of opinion that complaints ought not to be confined to the Board of Trade, and the Amendment was rejected. He did not know that much alteration of the clause would be required. It had been drawn with the view that complaint might be made to anybody. He did not suppose these cases would frequently happen. It would be hard to an owner not to have his costs, and it would be equally hard on the sailor to deprive him of his remedy because he could not give costs.

MR. GOURLEY hoped the President of the Board of Trade would maintain the clause, and accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford.

MR. RATHBONE said, it would be by no means unlikely, under the clause, for complaints to be made out of spite, arising from quarrels between masters and men.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that seeing the feeling of hon. Members generally, he would accept the Amendment, with the omission of the words "or the owner of any ship."

MR. GORST said, there were many reasons why it should not be permitted for seamen to call in question the competency of the master, and he was not disposed to admit the principle without further discussion and consideration.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT feared that the Committee was getting into a state of confusion, because while it had been decided that private persons might make complaints, there was no machinery provided for enabling them to do so. After a sailor had given security for costs, he could not give notice with respect to the appointment of assessors, that being in the hands of the Board of Trade.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought that the wording of the 3rd instruction might easily be adapted to the Amendment, by substituting for "the Board of Trade" the words "the person by whose application the complaint is made."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Discipline.

Clause 13 (Misconduct endangering ship or life or limb).

CAPTAIN PIM moved, as an Amendment, in page 7, line 23, after "discipline" to insert—

"Any master or other person in command of a British ship, who, by neglect of the lead in taking soundings shall cause the loss of the vessel then under his command and be convicted of the same, shall forfeit his certificate, and be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, if human life be sacrificed by the said neglect shall be deemed guilty of felony."

There had been two recent instances of great loss of life from the neglect of the lead.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, there was no necessity whatever for the proposed Amendment, because the Bill already provided for neglect, including all such cases. By specifying particular kinds of neglect exclusion of others might be inferred.

Amendment negatived.

MR. WILSON then moved the omission of the clause altogether, because it was so vaguely worded. It provided no machinery by which the charges could be made or the Act put in action.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK explained that nothing about a prosecutor was said in the clause, because, pursuant to the recommendation of the Royal Commission, the Bill constituted a public prosecutor in the shape of the Board of Trade, who in all cases would be charged with the duty of putting the enactment in force.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14 (Mutiny).

MR. BENTINCK moved, in page 8, line 10, to leave out "or without." He apprehended that one of the principal objects of the Bill was to save life at sea, and they must all admit that one of the most active causes of loss of life at sea was the want of discipline on board merchant vessels. Mutiny frequently involved the loss of the ship and also loss of life, and under this clause a person guilty of mutiny was to be sentenced to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, "with or without hard labour." To most men who misconducted themselves on board ship imprisonment without hard labour was not imprisonment at all, because they preferred idleness in prison to hard labour at sea, and he therefore thought that some punishment of a penal nature was necessary.

MR. COLE objected strenuously to the proposed Amendment, thinking that a discretion ought to be left with the presiding Judge. At the same time, he considered the system of hard labour altogether wrong. ["Oh, oh!"] Perhaps those who cried "Oh" knew nothing about the matter. Hard labour, as prescribed by the Prisons Act of 1865, was entirely a mistake, the true principle being industrial labour. At Devonport Gaol they had given up hard labour, and the result was, that the prisoners were put to industrial labour, and taught trades, and went out into the world very different men from what they were when first imprisoned. A whole wing had been built to that gaol entirely by industrial labour, and with a great saving to the ratepayers. Under the present system anyone sentenced to hard labour was for the first three months placed to what was called "first-class hard labour," which was the greatest absurdity under the sun—he had to wind up a winch or go on the treadmill, or carry shot from one end of the prison yard to the other and then bring it back again. The whole system was fallacious.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

MR. HUNT agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the Judge ought to have some discretion; but with regard to Devonport Gaol, the fact was that the discipline at that gaol had been found so little deterrent that the Admiralty had been obliged to cease sending prisoners there under the Navy Discipline Act, and had sent them to Bodmin Gaol instead, where the discipline was more strict.

MR. COLE said, the principle on which the prisoners were treated was identically the same in both gaols.

MR. NORWOOD thought the Court ought to have the discretion of awarding or not awarding hard labour, as proposed by the clause.

MR. D. JENKINS said, there might be cases where the extenuating circumstances were such that it was desirable not to inflict hard labour.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY pointed out that no change was made in the existing law by the clause, and deprecated the Committee sliding into a debate on prison discipline.

MR. BENTINCK had no objection to substitute the words "industrial labour" for "hard labour," in the clause; but, in its present shape, the punishment proposed could not act as deterrents. He would not trouble the Committee to divide.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 15 (Combining to disobey); and Clause 16 (Assault on officer), agreed to.

Clause 17 (Insubordination, breach of discipline, and negligence).

MR. MACDONALD said, that it was understood that one of the objects of the Bill was to lessen the penalties to which seamen would be subject, but instead of that, the Bill, and this clause particularly, inflicted more penalties and more punishments on seamen and apprentices. As a protest against this sort of legislation he would move the omission of the clause altogether. The system of increased punishment had rendered our Mercantile Marine more and more demoralized, and he thought the time had come to try some other policy than that of creating new forms of punishment with a view of improving the class for whom they were meant.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked why the penalties imposed by the clause should apply only to seamen and not to officers. This clause was unnecessary, because if carelessness or drunkenness endangered life or property they were already punishable with other offences under Clause 13; whilst if they did not they could hardly be called criminal offences, liable to be punished by imprisonment. He therefore thought the sub-sections of the clause relating to those matters should be struck out.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY declined to accede to the proposal, because the crimes punishable by the clause were different from those in the clause already passed. That was why the penalties imposed by the two clauses differed in nature and application. In the one case the punishment was for insubordination on the part of seamen, and in the other for incompetency of officers to command. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) that the punishments should be made milder than they were. The Royal Commissioners in their Report especially pointed out that the discipline was becoming rather too lax for the safety of the service, and did not give sufficient control to masters over their crews as regarded danger to life and limb.

MR. COLE supported the Amendment for the omission of the clause.

MR. FORSYTH said, if the clause was retained, it would have to be amended in its phraseology. For the word "continued" there would have to be substituted renewed or fresh acts of insubordination.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that the 13th clause exhausted all offences contemplated by the Bill, and yet the clause under notice provided that a sailor guilty of simple disobedience of orders, which might not lead to any harm, should be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be punishable with hard labour. He submitted that such an offence ought not to be punished with hard labour.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the Secretary of State had stated that the remedy for breach of contract should be by civil process, and also for the offence of disobedience; but, as regarded sailors, the right hon. Gentleman guarded himself, and said that the class of offences contemplated by the clause, considering the character of the employment of the sailor and the grave consequences that might result from disobedience short of loss of life or destruction of the ship, was a very serious one, and such as ought not to be allowed to go unpunished.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not agree with the hon. and learned Member that sailors, of all other classes, should be punished with hard labour for carelessness. Clause 13 provided a remedy for all such offences.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the offence of gross neglect and carelessness in a sailor was most serious, inasmuch as the destruction of life and ship might result from it.

MR. COLLINS would not go the length that the hon. and learned Solicitor General went in saying that a sailor should be punished with hard labour for carelessness. What he would suggest was that four weeks' imprisonment, without hard labour, would be sufficient punishment for the minor offence, as there was a great difference between them.

LORD ESLINGTON considered that it would be a great mistake to strike out the 17th clause, and that it was necessary to retain it in reference to the safety of life and property at sea.

MR. T. E. SMITH contended that there were many cases of insubordination which might be contrary to the discipline of the ship, and which might be attended with considerable danger.

MR. MACDONALD was of opinion that every punishment inflicted upon seamen would have the effect of preventing the country from getting good men to join the service. He would withdraw the Motion for the omission of the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18 (Neglect to keep lookout.)

CAPTAIN PIM proposed an Amendment providing that when a ship was in the vicinity of rocks or shoals it be the duty of the master to keep the lead constantly going.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in opposing the Amendment, said, the duty of keeping the lead going was only one among many duties, and it was unnecessary and undesirable to specify this particular duty. If duties were to be specified, it would be essential to have a complete list, or those not specified would be neglected with impunity.

CAPTAIN PIM said, that the loss both of the Schiller and the Cadiz was clearly attributable to neglect to keep the lead going. This neglect was, in fact, the cause of innumerable shipwrecks, and he should feel it his duty to press the Amendment to a division.

MR. BENTINCK protested against the Amendment being disposed of in so summary a manner by the President of the Board of Trade. In almost all cases of shipwreck in thick weather the loss was caused by neglect to keep the lead going. They were all aware of this, and he should vote for the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

On the Motion of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Amendment made in page 9, line 15, by leaving out "with or without hard labour."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 19 (Desertion and kindred offences.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved to reduce the period of imprisonment for desertion from six to four weeks, thinking that the penalty under this clause ought not to be more severe than it was under Clause 17.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, looking at the aggravated nature of the offence, could not accede to the proposed Amendment. The hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Grieve) had given Notice of an Amendment to make the punishment three months instead of six weeks.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved an Amendment with the object of giving the magistrates a discretionary power to mitigate the punishment for failure on the part of a seaman to join his ship by imposing a fine of £5 instead of imprisonment with or without hard labour. It was desirable that discretionary power should be given in cases where men failed to join their ships for simple carelessness or because they got drunk on the proceeds of bank notes.

Sir Charles Adderley

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL pointed out that the object which the hon. and learned Gentleman had in view was practically met by subsequent words giving the magistrates the discretion in such cases to mulct the offender to the extent of 24 days' pay.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HAMOND moved in page 10, line 10, to insert—

"Any offence committed by any seaman or apprentice under sections 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 19, shall be entered in the log-book by the master within 48 hours after such offence may have been committed."

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought there was no necessity for fixing so rigid a limit.

MR. BENTINCK was of opinion that they got on better before the official log was invented.

MR. CHILDERS did not think there was any occasion for the insertion of the proposed words. The present provision was quite sufficient.

Amendment negatived.

On Question, "That the clause be agreed to?"

MR. MACDONALD moved its rejection. The clause was too vague and general in its character, and it would act unduly and oppressively on the seamen. These men fell into the hands of crimps, were kept in a state of drunkenness by the system of advance notes, and were then subjected to penal punishment for breach of contract. Contract had been pronounced, both by the Government and a Royal Commission, to be purely civil in its character, and he protested against any proposition which would render the breach of it criminal.

MR. MAC IVER, in supporting the Motion, said, that there was every desire on the part of the magistrates to do justice to all concerned in the cases brought before them, but he thought that this clause would perpetuate the grievance which already existed—namely, that our seamen should be treated differently from any other class of those who laboured for the wealth of this country, and therefore, if the hon. Member for Stafford went to a division, he should cordially support him.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 20 (Power of arrest in cases of desertion.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved an Amendment with the object of doing away with summary arrest within Her Majesty's dominions, by requiring the warrant of a magistrate for the arrest of any deserter from his ship to be brought before him, when he might order his removal to the ship from which he had deserted or absented himself, but permitting his summary arrest in foreign States so far as the law of the place permitted.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 18, to leave out all the words after the word "offence," to the word "require," in line 26, inclusive."—(Sir W. Vernon Harcourt.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY admitted that the power proposed to be re-enacted by the clause would be a violation of the ordinary constitutional law, though it had been statute law for 20 years, but pointed out that the circumstances in which seamen were placed were of such a peculiar character as to justify a departure from the ordinary rule of law in cases of their desertion. The ship might be upon the point of sailing, and there might not be any magistrate at hand to whom to apply on the matter. Desertion might take place on various opportunities during a voyage. A seaman's desertion endangered the lives of the rest of the crew. It could not be dealt with as a common breach of contract, nor as amenable to common police arrangements.

MR. MC CARTHY DOWNING supported the Amendment, as there was not any place into which a ship could put where it would not be easy to find a magistrate to grant a warrant. Difficulty might be experienced in some parts of Ireland in arresting, without a warrant, sailors who had deserted, in consequence of the view the people might take of such a proceeding.

Question put, "That the words 'master or any mate' stand part of the clause."

MR. T. E. SMITH urged the hon. and learned Gentlemen the Member for the City of Oxford to limit the operation of his Amendment to the United Kingdom, as the circumstances of the colonies were peculiar.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was willing to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the Amendment, having been put, could not be varied.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 128: Majority 75.

On the Motion of MR. GRIEVE, Amendment made in page 10, line 19, by inserting after "husband," the word agent."

MR. RITCHIE moved the omission from the clause of the words "without warrant" with reference to the arrest of sailors guilty of desertion. His object was to prevent such a proceeding taking place within the United Kingdom.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 22, to leave out the words "without warrant."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question put, "That the words 'without warrant' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 191; Noes 137: Majority 54.

MR. CHILDERS moved, in page 16, line 24, after the word "dominions," to insert the words "except in a British possession, in which the law may otherwise provide." Some such proviso was necessary now that we had given constitutional government to our colonies. Under the Act, a sailor who had deserted from a British ship might be followed 50 miles inland, arrested without a warrant, and brought before a magistrate. That law conflicted with the law in some of the colonies, and in a recent case a sailor thus arrested without a warrant and brought before a magistrate was discharged, because, according to the law of the colony, he had been arrested illegally. Such a capture might be resisted and blood might be shed, in which event the most injurious consequences might ensue.

MR. GORST hoped that the Government would accept the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he saw no reason why this law, which was applicable to sailors deserting in the United Kingdom, should not also apply to similar offenders in any part of Her Majesty's dominions. There could be no doubt that the Act of the Imperial Legislature would override any law passed by the local Legislature of any colony with reference to this subject. Although this power of following and arresting a seaman was exceptional, it was necessary to enable trade and commerce to be carried on. While the captain was going in search of a magistrate, the sailor who had deserted might slip away and elude his grasp. If a man were arrested under this Bill, and could show that the arrest was unjustifiable, he could recover £20 from the person causing his arrest; while if a man were arrested under the warrant of a magistrate he would have no remedy.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he had heard with amazement the doctrine that an Imperial Act would override the Acts of a Colonial Legislature. He differed from his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, who, he thought, had laid down the proposition he had in terms too large. The Common Law of England would no doubt prevail in any colony where there was no existing law, and so would a statute prevail in certain cases. But where representative Government had been granted to a colony, an Imperial Act could not override the law of that colony, so long as that constitution existed. He ventured to say that if any attempt to carry out this clause were made in a colony having a Legislature of its own, where arrest without warrant was illegal, any person who arrested a man without a warrant would be liable to an action for false imprisonment.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he was unable to agree with the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury, because it had always been held that on certain Imperial questions the Imperial Parliament could legislate for a colony. At the same time, as a matter of policy, he put it to the President of the Board of Trade, whether it was desirable to enforce that change of the law on colonies which had responsible Governments, such as Canada, Australia, and the Cape? It was desirable, as far as possible, to limit Imperial laws to the United Kingdom.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT hoped the Government would accept the advice of the last speaker and not endorse the high Prerogative doctrine of the Solicitor General. It was exactly by such a dangerous assertion of power on the part of the Imperial Legislature that they lost their great colonies in America, and he thought the Crown Lawyers of the present day would have profited by that experience of the past. It was both unnecessary and impolitic to raise those questions in regard to colonies having representative institutions.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that they had already decided that that power of arrest without warrant was necessary in some cases, and, if it were abolished, he did not hesitate to say there would be no safety in the Mercantile Marine service. It had existed for 25 years without question and without abuse. The only point now in dispute was that raised by the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Pontefract, who wished to extend the words of limitation "so far as the law of the place so permits," so as to make them apply to a colony. He believed the law followed the ship, and that that would enable the shipowner to make an arrest in any part of the world under this Act. At the same time, he was willing to accept the words of the right hon. Gentleman, "except in a British possession in which the law may otherwise provide."

Amendment agreed to.

Words inserted.

On the Motion of Mr. HERSCHELL, Amendment made, in page 10, line 40, by inserting after the word "arrest," the words "in case the person arrested accepts the sum so imposed as a penalty."

MR. E. J. REED said, that as the next Amendment was of considerable importance he would propose that the Chairman should report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. DISRAELI expressed a hope that the Committee would proceed with the Bill until 1 o'clock. If they did not, he should have to ask the House to sit at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Motion negatived.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY moved, in page 10, line 41, to insert—

"Provided always, That no master or owner of any ship, nor any other person with respect to any ship, shall be entitled or allowed to proceed against any seaman or apprentice under the provisions of this section or of the preceding section, unless such ship shall at some time previously have been surveyed by a surveyor, or by a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade, and by the committee of management of the Register of British and Foreign Shipping."

pool Underwriters' Registry of Foreign Vessels, or by some other British or foreign corporation or association for the time being approved by the Board of Trade, and shall have received a certificate of classification good for a certain period, which period shall, at the time of such proceedings, be unexpired."

The Amendment was required to protect seamen against the tyranny of masters and owners in the case of unclassified ships.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought the question could be more conveniently discussed when an Amendment of which the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had given Notice came on for consideration.

MR. PLIMSOLL recommended the withdrawal of the Amendment, in order that the subject might be fully discussed at a later stage of the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MAC IVER proposed the omission of the clause, and said, there was no first-class vessel that was not either classed or surveyed. He believed that under this clause a great deal of hardship would be inflicted on the true British sailor.

MR. RATHBONE was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman say that all first-class vessels were classed and surveyed. To his knowledge numerous first-class ships were neither classed nor surveyed.

MR. MAC IVER asked the hon. Member to name a single first-class vessel that was not either classed or surveyed.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, this was a most important clause, one affecting the lives and welfare of sailors, and he should certainly go into the Lobby and vote in favour of the hon. Member's Motion to omit the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked upon the importance of the Amendment, and should also support the hon. Member who moved its omission. It was a remarkable fact that although that clause was proposed for the sake of shipowners, no shipowner in that House had raised his voice in favour of it. The large and good shipowners did not care about the clause, because they were always sure to get good men to man their ships; but it was the bad shipowners that the sailors did not like to enter into contract with, and they were constantly punished for refusing to go to sea in their ships.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 171; Noes 121: Majority 50.

MR. T. E. SMITH moved that the Chairman report Progress, observing that it wanted only 20 minutes to 1, and that the next clause related to the unseaworthiness of ships.

MR. DISRAELI: I will not oppose the Motion, because I wish to show the House that I am sensible of the courtesy which they have always extended to me.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 189.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in moving that the House go into Committee upon the Bill, promised that none of the clauses which were opposed should be taken.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought that the measure ought not to be proceeded with at that hour of the morning.

MR. RONAYNE moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, all that he asked was that the House would forward the Bill a stage, and the questions to be debated might be considered hereafter.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Ronayne.)

The House divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 167: Majority 156.

Main-Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MELDON said, he should move to report Progress. A Bill of this importance should not be considered at so late an hour (twenty minutes past 1 o'clock).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Meldon.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 119: Majority 98.

MR. MC CARTHY DOWNING moved that the Chairman should leave the Chair.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

SUMMARY PROSECUTIONS APPEALS

SCOTLAND (re-committed) BILL.

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

[BILL 191.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CHARLES LEWIS, referring to the opposition to the previous Bill, thought no more business should be taken. He should therefore move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

THE LORD ADVOCATE did not see why Irish Members should interfere with the progress of Scotch business.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the hon. Member (Mr. Lewis) was not an Irishman, though he had done an Irish constituency the honour of representing it. Generally the Irish Members were only anxious to assist Scotch Members in managing Scotch business according to Scotch ideas.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for Kircaldy (Sir George Campbell), who had important Amendments on the Paper, had gone away. He wished to know if the Lord Advocate had made any arrangement with him.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had not. He thought the hon. Member should have been in his place.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Mr. Meldon

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY [SALARIES].

REGISTRATION OF TRADE MARKS.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in presenting a Bill for the registration of Trade Marks, said, that a measure on this subject had been promised in the early part of the Session. The necessity for the registration of trade marks had become apparent some years ago, and that necessity was still more apparent now, owing to the great increase of trade and commerce. At present, great difficulty was experienced in foreign countries by British subjects in proving that a trade mark had been registered in this country, and the law of foreign countries required, for the most part, that there should be a registration. It was to get rid of these difficulties, and grant further facilities for the registration of trade marks, that this Bill was introduced. For this purpose the Bill provided for the establishment of a register of trade marks, under the superintendence of the Commissioners of Patents. The trade mark must be registered as belonging to a particular class of goods, and the first person registered as proprietor would be prima facie entitled to the exclusive use of such trade mark.

Bill to establish a Register of Trade Marks presented by the LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1<sup>a</sup>; to be printed; and to be read 2<sup>a</sup> on Monday next. (No. 167.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

VOL. CCXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

CONSPIRACY AND PROTECTION OF PROPERTY BILL.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, as several Questions have been put to me as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the repealing of the Master and Servant Act and the Acts mentioned in the Schedule with regard to the Labour Laws, I think it will be convenient for me to state that I find it will be more satisfactory, instead of bringing in a third Bill, to move the following new clause in Committee on the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Bill:—

(Repeal of Acts.)

"On and after the commencement of this Act, there shall be repealed:—

"I. 'The Master and Servant Act, 1867,' and the enactments specified in the First Schedule to that Act with the exceptions following, as to the enactments in such Schedule (that is to say):—

"(1.) Except so much of sections one and two of the Act passed in the thirty-third year of the reign of King George the Third, chapter fifty-five, intituled 'An Act to authorise Justices of the Peace to impose Fines upon Constables, Overseers, and other Peace or Parish Officers for Neglect of Duty, and on Masters or Apprentices for Ill-usage of such their Apprentices; and also to make provision for the execution of Warrants of Distress granted by Magistrates,' as relates to constables, overseers, and other peace or parish officers; and

"(2.) Except the Act of the session of the fifth and sixth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seven, intituled 'An Act to explain the Acts for the better regulation of certain Apprentices;' and

"(3.) Except sub-sections one, two, three, and five of section sixteen of 'The Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Act, 1851,' relating to certain disputes between employers and the persons employed by them; and

"II. The following enactments making breaches of contract criminal, and relating to the recovery of wages by summary procedure (that is to say):—

"(a.) An Act passed in the fifth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, chapter four, and intituled 'An Act touching dyvers orders for Artificers, Labourers, Servantes of Husbandrye, and Apprentices;' and

"(b.) So much of section two of an Act passed in the twelfth year of King George the First, chapter thirty-four, and intituled 'An Act to prevent unlawful combination of Workmen employed in the Woollen Manufactures, and for better payment of their Wages;' as relates to quitting service; and

"(c.) Section twenty of an Act passed in the fifth year of King George the Third, chapter fifty-one, the title of which begins with the words 'An Act for repealing several Laws relating to the manufacture of Woollen Cloth in the county of York,' and ends with the words 'for preserving the credit of the said manufacture at the Foreign Market;' and

"(d.) An Act passed in the nineteenth year of King George the Third, chapter forty-nine, and intitled 'An Act to prevent abuses in the payment of Wages to Persons employed in the bone and thread lace manufactory; and

"(e.) Section seventeen of an Act passed in the Session of the sixth and seventh years of Her present Majesty, chapter forty, the title of which begins with the words 'An Act to amend the Laws,' and ends with the words 'Workmen engaged therein;' and

"(f.) Section seven of an Act passed in the Session of the eighth and ninth years of Her present Majesty, chapter one hundred and twenty-eight, and intitled 'An Act to make further Regulations respecting the tickets of work to be delivered to silk weavers in certain cases.'

"Provided that,—

"(1.) Any order for wages or further sum of compensation in addition to wages made in pursuance of section sixteen of 'The Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Act, 1851,' may be enforced in like manner as if it were an order made by a court of summary jurisdiction in pursuance of this Act, and not otherwise; and

"(2.) The repeal enacted by this section shall not affect—

"(a.) Anything duly done or suffered, or any right or liability acquired or incurred under any enactment hereby repealed; or

"(b.) Any penalty, forfeiture, or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against any enactment hereby repealed; or

"(c.) Any investigation, legal proceeding, or remedy in respect of any such right, liability, penalty, forfeiture, or punishment as aforesaid; and any such investigation, legal proceeding, and remedy may be carried on as if this Act had not passed."

SURGEONS IN THE ROYAL NAVY.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he has any objection to inform the House if there be any authority whereby Surgeons in the Royal Navy can be forced to serve after having tendered their resignations and having intimated their desire to leave the service; whether it is true that Dr. James Donovan, of Her Majesty's ship "Dido," then in Australian waters, having been refused leave to resign his commission, was then denied, by Commodore Goodenough, permission to proceed to England, at his own expense, on most urgent private affairs, involving the risk of the loss of a considerable sum of money; whether it is true that this gentleman, having refused to serve in the steerage of Her Majesty's ship "Dido," there being the full complement of medical officers on board, and no cabin accommodation for him as surgeon, was arrested and suffered close arrest for more than a fortnight; and that, having forwarded to the Admiralty a statement of his reasons for leaving the station without leave, he was dismissed the service as a deserter, without trial; owing, as stated by the authorities, to the great difficulty of trying him by court-martial and the extenuating circumstances of his case; and, whether the First Lord of the Admiralty will state to the House the facts of the case and what those extenuating circumstances were?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the acceptance of the resignation of the commission of a surgeon in the Navy is in the discretion of the Admiralty, and it must be obvious to the hon. Member that officers cannot be allowed to throw up their commissions when and where they choose. Mr. Donovan, of Her Majesty's ship Dido, asked leave to resign his commission on the Australian station last year, and was refused. He has stated to the Admiralty that he was denied by the Commodore permission to return to England at his own expense on urgent private affairs. The Commodore has been called upon to report upon that statement, but his report has not yet been received. The facts in connection with Mr. Donovan's dismissal from the Service are as follows:—Mr. Donovan was granted leave of absence from Sydney to go and bring his wife from Melbourne. Instead of returning to his duty at Sydney, he took ship from Melbourne to England under a false name. On his arrival in this country he was apprehended as a deserter, and put under close arrest, and it was intended to send him back to the station to be tried by court-martial in the usual course. He applied to resign his commission to avoid a court-martial. This was refused. He then wrote admitting that he had deserted, and asking that his case might be dealt with early by the Admiralty, and setting out, among other matters as an excuse for his conduct, the inconveniences he had suffered from want of cabin accommodation, and that he had been refused leave to come home on urgent private affairs. His statements were assumed to be true, and treated as extenuating circumstances, and he was dismissed the Service.

CITY OF LONDON — THE NEEDLE-MAKERS' COMPANY.—QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen on the 15th of June, when that Court voted to authorize the sale, through the Needlemakers' Company, to one hundred persons, of the right for life to vote for the representation in Parliament for the city of London, at the price of twenty-five guineas for each such right to vote; and, whether, if such a proceeding is legal, he will take steps to abolish such power to sell the franchise for money?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that by the ancient customs of the City it rested with the Court of Aldermen to exercise visitatorial powers over the City Companies, and in that capacity they granted to the Liveries the power, when due case was made out, to fix their number. The desire to become citizens of London had very much increased of late years; and though the power referred to in the Question had often been exercised, there was no reason to suppose that it had ever been either sought for or granted for political purposes either on one side or the other. Considering the exceptional position of the City as a place of commerce, and not of residence, there were numerous persons largely interested in the City who had no means of becoming citizens except through the Livery Companies, and it was therefore not the intention of the Government at present to interfere with the ancient custom.

EDUCATION — KIBWORTH ENDOWED SCHOOL.—QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Why the recommendation of the late Endowed Schools Commissioners for the remodelling of the Kibworth

Grammar School has not been adopted; what is the cause of the delay which has occurred since the period of the said recommendation; and, whether it is the intention of the Privy Council to adopt the scheme proposed or any other?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The scheme of the late Endowed Schools Commissioners for Kibworth Grammar School has not yet been adopted, because serious local objections have been, and are being raised to it, which the Committee of Council on Education is bound to consider. In all such cases it is the duty of the Committee to endeavour to effect such an arrangement between the various parties locally interested in the endowment as may give the best hopes of getting the scheme, when it is passed, satisfactorily and harmoniously worked; but to effect this desirable object it is, of course, obvious that much time is often needed. Such has been the case as respects the Kibworth scheme, which it is the intention of the Privy Council to adopt, with such modifications as possibly they may consider desirable, as soon as they think there is a good prospect of the above-mentioned object being secured.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER — GROUND ON SOUTHERN FRONT.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked the First Commissioner of Works, What use will be made of the space of ground recently cleared to the South of the Palace of Westminster, and whether he will lay any proposed plan upon the Table of the House before the Prorogation of Parliament?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: The space to which my hon. and gallant Friend alludes, to the south of the Palace of Westminster, was purchased and cleared in order to diminish the danger to the Houses of Parliament from fire. The width of it is 366 feet, and of this it is intended to rail off 150 feet nearest the buildings and keep it free. The Government have not yet decided what shall be done with the remainder of the ground, and, therefore, my hon. and gallant Friend will readily see that it will not be in my power to lay on the Table a proposed plan before the end of the Session.

"(c.) Section twenty of an Act passed in the fifth year of King George the Third, chapter fifty-one, the title of which begins with the words 'An Act for repealing several Laws relating to the manufacture of Woollen Cloth in the county of York,' and ends with the words 'for preserving the credit of the said manufacture at the Foreign Market;' and had been the habit as to the arrangement of the Business of the ensuing day. In the early part of the Sitting of yesterday a Question was put by the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes), having reference to the progress of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill, and no certain intimation was made by the Government; but to-day the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill had been put down as the second Order. He thought that many Members must have been taken by surprise when they found that the Friendly Societies Bill was down as the first Order.

MR. FORSYTH said, he was taken by surprise on finding that the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill was the second Order of the Day. In answer to the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes) the Lord Advocate said he could not tell on what day that Bill would be proceeded with; whereupon his hon. and learned Friend said he would put his Question again next Friday. Nobody had the least idea that it would come on to-day. The Bill was interesting to lawyers; but he did not suppose there were more than three or four lawyers then in the House, all the rest being engaged elsewhere. The Bill was put on the Paper without a single minute's notice. There were many important Amendments on the Paper and they ought not to be discussed in the absence of the Bar. What would have been said if the Regimental Exchanges Bill had been put down when it was known that there could not be a fair attendance of military officers?

MR. FAWCETT, in order that the course which was now proposed to be adopted by the Government might not be drawn into a precedent, expressed his intention of concluding his remarks with an Amendment to the Motion proposed by the Secretary of State for War. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the course which he had proposed was the usual course. On the contrary, he (Mr. Fawcett) thought the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington) had conclusively proved that so far from being the usual course it was entirely without precedent, and that the present Government, though they had no great measures before the House, were making demands on the rights of private Members that had never been made before. In 1870, when three of the greatest measures ever passed became law, the late Government did not call upon private Members to give up their evenings on Tuesdays and Fridays until well on in June, and did not propose to take away the whole of Tuesdays from private Members until July 25; whereas the present Government had taken Morning Sittings in March. The impression prevalent among independent Members when they gave up willingly to the Government Morning Sittings in May was that the Government would not make the usual demands on the time of private Members in June and July. They found, however, that Morning Sittings were continued in June, and they would shortly be expected to pass a Motion which they had never been asked to pass before. In his opinion, the Government would prefer to see one or two of the Government measures sacrificed rather than the House should be denied an opportunity of discussing some of the important Motions put down by private Members. In order to test the feeling of the House, he should move, as an Amendment to the right hon. Gentleman's Motion, to substitute the words "after Tuesday, July 13," and he hoped to have the support of the hon. Members for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) and York (Mr. J. Lowther) who had in former Sessions stood out so firmly for the privileges of private Members. He did not know whether the hon. Member for York would be permitted to express his opinion.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "next," in order to insert the words "the 13th day of July,"—(Mr. Fawcett,—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'next' stand part of the Question."

MR. LOPES said, he was told last evening that the Government could not say when the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill would be taken into Committee, and he undertook to renew the Question on Friday. He was therefore somewhat surprised to find it the second Order for the present

The Marquess of Hartington

Morning Sitting. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had an important Resolution to move, which must be moved on going into Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not attend the present Sitting. He trusted the Government would not proceed with the Bill now, but would take it as the First Order at some ordinary Sitting. He also expressed a hope that the Committee would be taken before hon. and learned Members who desired to discuss the subject were called away on Circuit.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that they had now to consider a very important question, affecting not only the understood arrangements entered into yesterday, but the general conduct of Business during the remainder of the Session. He agreed with his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) that the Government had put the House in a very unpleasant position. They were asked to give up Tuesdays to the Government at a much earlier time than they had ever been asked to do so by any previous Government. Hitherto that request had been made in the last week or two of the Session, when the House knew what measures the Government intended to proceed with. It was much to be regretted that the Leader of the House was not now present to state what the Government really meant to do. The right hon. Gentleman made a statement some weeks ago that he meant to pass all the Government measures which had been read a second time; but he could scarcely think the right hon. Gentleman was serious when he said that. Unless some information were given to the House he should be obliged to vote with the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), though he should do so reluctantly, because it was a matter on which the opinion of the Government ought to carry great weight with the House. Still, that opinion ought not to be expressed until after information had been given. It would be better to allow the Motion to be adjourned in order that a statement might be made by the Prime Minister before the Motion was put that Tuesdays be given up by independent Members. This was not merely a question for the present Session, but they must take care that a new precedent was not created.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he wished to put in a plea on behalf of independent Members. The harshness and severity of Morning Sittings consisted in this—that their weight and pressure fell most upon those Members who were really willing to work in the House. Hon. Gentlemen could not be in two places at once, and he had himself on more than one occasion this year experienced the absolute impossibility of recording his votes in consequence of being present in a Committee Room upstairs. He never remembered the pressure of Morning Sittings to be so severely felt as they had been this year; and he thought it was right that this protest should be made, not as a Party matter, but on behalf of hon. Members generally. Independent Members were now asked to give up Tuesdays. Government would no doubt urge that this was necessary in order to advance the many measures they had in hand; but he wanted to know why those measures should be proceeded with in such haste? He felt that the House had a right to protest against this proposal, and he hoped the Government would assent to the suggestion which had been made and postpone the question until the Prime Minister, who managed the House with so much skill and dexterity, and, he was bound to say, courtesy, was in his place.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, when he came down to the House he had no idea that there would be any dispute as to the Motion which stood in the name of the Prime Minister. He did not know until very late that the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill was on the Paper, and he had had no opportunity of communicating with his right hon. Friend, and did not know that he would be absent. It was another matter which brought him down at the Sitting of the House. He had to apologize for the mistake he had made as to the periods of the Sessions at which, in former years, his Motion had been made, and no doubt the right hon. Gentlemen opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster), who had taken some pains on this point, was correct. He was anxious that the House should proceed to business; and, under the circumstances, he was sure his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) would be desirous of stating his reasons for the Motion. He should therefore accept the sugges-

had been the habit as to the arrangement of the Business of the ensuing day. In the early part of the Sitting of yesterday a Question was put by the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes), having reference to the progress of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill, and no certain intimation was made by the Government; but to-day the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill had been put down as the second Order. The impression prevalent among independent Members when they gave up willingly to the Government Morning Sittings in May was that the Government would not make the usual demands on the time of private Members in June and July. They found, however, that Morning Sittings were continued in June, and they would shortly be expected to pass a Motion which they had never been asked to pass before. In his opinion, the Government would prefer to see one or two of the Government measures sacrificed rather than the House should be denied an opportunity of discussing some of the important Motions put down by private Members. In order to test the feeling of the House, he should move, as an Amendment to the right hon. Gentleman's Motion, to substitute the words "after Tuesday, July 13," and he hoped to have the support of the hon. Members for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) and York (Mr. J. Lowther) who had in former Sessions stood out so firmly for the privileges of private Members. He did not know whether the hon. Member for York would be permitted to express his opinion.

Mr. DILLWYN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "next," in order to insert the words "the 13th day of July,"—(Mr. Fawcett,—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'next' stand part of the Question."

Mr. LOPES said, he was told last evening that the Government could not say when the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill would be taken into Committee, and he undertook to renew the Question on Friday. He was therefore somewhat surprised to find it the second Order for the present

The Marquess of Hartington

Morning Sitting. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had an important Resolution to move, which must be moved on going into Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not attend the present Sitting. He trusted the Government would not proceed with the Bill now, but would take it as the First Order at some ordinary Sitting. He also expressed a hope that the Committee would be taken before hon. and learned Members who desired to discuss the subject were called away on Circuit.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that they had now to consider a very important question, affecting not only the understood arrangements entered into yesterday, but the general conduct of Business during the remainder of the Session. He agreed with his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) that the Government had put the House in a very unpleasant position. They were asked to give up Tuesdays to the Government at a much earlier time than they had ever been asked to do so by any previous Government. Hitherto that request had been made in the last week or two of the Session, when the House knew what measures the Government intended to proceed with. It was much to be regretted that the Leader of the House was not now present to state what the Government really meant to do. The right hon. Gentleman made a statement some weeks ago that he meant to pass all the Government measures which had been read a second time; but he could scarcely think the right hon. Gentleman was serious when he said that. Unless some information were given to the House he should be obliged to vote with the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), though he should do so reluctantly, because it was a matter on which the opinion of the Government ought to carry great weight with the House. Still, that opinion ought not to be expressed until after information had been given. It would be better to allow the Motion to be adjourned in order that a statement might be made by the Prime Minister before the Motion was put that Tuesdays be given up by independent Members. This was not merely a question for the present Session, but they must take care that a new precedent was not created.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he wished to put in a plea on behalf of independent Members. The harshness and severity of Morning Sittings consisted in this—that their weight and pressure fell most upon those Members who were really willing to work in the House. Hon. Gentlemen could not be in two places at once, and he had himself on more than one occasion this year experienced the absolute impossibility of recording his votes in consequence of being present in a Committee Room upstairs. He never remembered the pressure of Morning Sittings to be so severely felt as they had been this year; and he thought it was right that this protest should be made, not as a Party matter, but on behalf of hon. Members generally. Independent Members were now asked to give up Tuesdays. Government would no doubt urge that this was necessary in order to advance the many measures they had in hand; but he wanted to know why those measures should be proceeded with in such haste? He felt that the House had a right to protest against this proposal, and he hoped the Government would assent to the suggestion which had been made and postpone the question until the Prime Minister, who managed the House with so much skill and dexterity, and, he was bound to say, courtesy, was in his place.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, when he came down to the House he had no idea that there would be any dispute as to the Motion which stood in the name of the Prime Minister. He did not know until very late that the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill was on the Paper, and he had had no opportunity of communicating with his right hon. Friend, and did not know that he would be absent. It was another matter which brought him down at the Sitting of the House. He had to apologize for the mistake he had made as to the periods of the Sessions at which, in former years, his Motion had been made, and no doubt the right hon. Gentlemen opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster), who had taken some pains on this point, was correct. He was anxious that the House should proceed to business; and, under the circumstances, he was sure his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) would be desirous of stating his reasons for the Motion. He should therefore accept the suggestion that the debate should be adjourned until Thursday next.

MR. NEWDEGATE rejoiced that the noble Lord opposite had assumed his proper function as Leader of the Opposition, who always ought to act in defence of the rights of the unofficial Members of this House. He had himself at the beginning of the Session urged that the House should use its discretion with respect to the character and number of measures introduced by private Members. The legitimate remedy was in the hands of the House. At the commencement of every Session due notice and information as to the character and machinery of every Bill proposed for introduction, and then on the Motion for leave to introduce, the House exercised its judgment as to whether the Bill should take its place in the Order Book. He could compare the Order Book of the House at present to nothing but a waste-paper basket turned upside down. The course taken by the Government was peculiarly inconsistent on their part, since their plea on coming into office was to bring relief to the country from excessive legislation. He was glad that the Motion for Adjournment had relieved him from the painful duty of voting against the Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked whether the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill would be proceeded with on Wednesday?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that hon. Members engaged in the Courts would be in the House at 4 o'clock, and would probably like to go on with it.

In reply to Mr. M'LAREN,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, stated that he could not definitely fix the hour at which the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Bill would be taken. At this period of the Session it was impossible to say that they would take a particular Bill at a particular time. It was possible that the measure might be brought on later that day.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL. [Bill 196.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Clause 4 (Definitions).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, in page 2, after line 4, to insert—

"1. Industrial Assurance Company' means any Company, as defined by 'The Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870,' which grants assurances on any one life for a less sum than twenty pounds, and which receives premiums or contributions in Great Britain or Ireland, by means of collectors, at less periodical intervals than two months."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Classes of societies).

MR. ESTCOURT moved, in page 4, line 19, to leave out "thirty," and insert "fifty," the effect of this being to allow the Societies to grant annuities up to £50. He pointed out that £50 was not now of the value it was some years ago, and that in granting the Societies this extension they were meeting only the necessities of the case. Besides, the Post Office did grant annuities up to £50.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 19, to leave out the word "thirty," and insert the word "fifty,"—(Mr. Estcourt.)—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON thought that £30 would be too narrow a limit, and therefore he hoped that there would be some extension of it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER sympathized with both his hon. Friends in their desire to extend the benefits of the Friendly Societies; but the limit must be drawn somewhere, and, after all, this legislation was of an exceptional character. Special privileges were granted to these Societies for the benefit of a particular class of the community, and they must take care that they did not extend this special legislation further than was absolutely necessary for the purpose in view. The limit had been found generally to be convenient, and though, no doubt, some Societies would wish to extend their limits, yet he thought that, upon the whole, it would be unwise to break the limits that Parliament had already fixed. The object of this Bill was not to create a new class of Societies, but to regulate existing Societies. They also should be careful lest they trenched upon the business of Insurance Companies. He could not accept the Amendment.

Question, "That the word 'thirty' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 10 (The registry office).

MR. MELDON moved, in page 5, line 9, after "registrar," to insert "and the assistant registrar for Ireland." He said, as the Bill was originally framed, the Assistant Registrar for Ireland was merely an Assistant of the Registrar for England. When in Committee upon the Bill, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made some concessions, and made the Assistant Registrar in Ireland the Irish Registrar, and granted an appeal to the Courts of Ireland. The Assistant Registrar had, therefore, important duties, and he proposed that he should be a barrister of not less than 20 years' standing. That would put him in the same position as the English Registrar, and he considered they ought both to be put upon the same footing.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 9, after the word "registrar," to insert the words "and the assistant registrar for Ireland."—(Mr. Meldon.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought great inconvenience would be caused if the Amendment was adopted. It would be inconvenient to cut themselves off from the chance of appointing to the office of Assistant Registrar in Ireland a gentleman who was a solicitor. He did not think it was quite reasonable that the hon. and learned Gentleman should insist that in every particular the Registrar and Assistant Registrar should be placed upon an absolute equality.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA quite agreed with the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. MELDON moved, in page 7, line 3, at end to add the following sub-section:—

"10. All notices, requisitions, certificates, acknowledgments, returns, and documents which by this Act are required to be served, made, given, furnished upon, by, or to the central office or chief registrar shall, in the case of Societies registered in Ireland, be served, made, given, and furnished to the Assistant Registrar for Ireland."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it better that this matter should be relegated to the Treasury. The matter was purely one of procedure, and could best be determined by the Treasury.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Registry of societies).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, in page 7, sub-section 4, line 20, after "thereof," to insert—

"If the rules thereof contain distinct provision for meeting all claims upon the Society existing at the time of division, before any such division takes place."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Cancelling and suspension of registry).

MR. MELDON moved, in page 8, line 23, after "registrar," to insert "or in case of a Society registered in Ireland, the assistant registrar for Ireland." He wished to acknowledge the great care which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had bestowed on the Bill, which would prove of great advantage to the public, and probably be the most useful measure of the Session. But that advantage would be lessened if, while Societies in Ireland were allowed to be registered by the Assistant Registrar, with an appeal to the Courts, when the slightest matter of detail arose the authority of that officer was ousted, and that of the Chief Registrar invoked. Suppose all the members of the Society wished to dissolve, why should not the man who was competent to deal with its registration be competent to deal with its cancellation? He thought that it would involve much inconvenience and expense if it was necessary that those interested in Irish Societies should come over to England to get the cancellation of their Registrar.

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 23, after the word "registrar," to insert the words "or in case of a society registered in Ireland, the assistant registrar for Ireland."—(Mr. Meldon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER begged to tender his thanks to the hon. and learned Gentleman for the manner in which he had spoken of the measure, and also for the spirit in which he had discussed the various Amendments she had moved. He was sorry he could not accept the present Amendment, as it would probably lead to confusion. It was very undesirable that there should be two authorities; it might lead to conflicting decisions, and a difference of action between one part of the Kingdom and another. He thought that the hon. Member had exaggerated the inconvenience which would be felt by those who might be required to come over to this country to obtain the cancellation of an Irish Society's register.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he could not understand why the Assistant Registrar in Ireland should not have the power to cancel the register of a Society registered in Ireland. The decisions of the Assistant Registrar would be subject to revision and reversal before the Courts of Law in Ireland, just as the Chief Registrars were to be subject to the revision of the English Courts, and this being so there could be no well founded complaint against the competency of the Assistant Registrar to give a decision which was subject to appeal if it was not accepted.

MR. BUTT said, it was a great injustice to the Irish people that they should be compelled to go to the trouble and expense of bringing these cases on appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, instead of in the Irish Court.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY supported the Amendment. If it was not adopted the Act would become a dead letter in Ireland.

MR. GREGORY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might, with propriety, adopt the Amendment. It would be very expensive and a great hardship that the Irish Societies should have to come to England to have their certificates cancelled.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH pointed out that the Amendment, if adopted, would allow the Assistant Registrar to go beyond his proper functions, and that he might override the decisions given by the Chief Registrar. The case, as regarded Societies in Ireland alone, was met by another clause of the Bill, which gave the Chief Registrar power to delegate certain of his functions to the Assistant Registrars, and the cancellation of registry of Societies confined to Ireland was a duty which might be most properly so delegated.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that in dealing with the cancellation of certificates it was desirable it should be done on some uniform and intelligible principle. It would be better to agree to the clause, and give an appeal from the Chief Central Registrar to the Irish Court of Queen's Bench.

MR. DODSON said, the difficulty must be got rid of by introducing into the Amendment the word "exclusively" registered in Ireland.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the word "exclusively" would be liable to misconception.

MR. W. HOLMS said, it would be only making the Bill uniform by giving the same power to Ireland that was to be extended to Scotland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was desirous to meet the views of the hon. Member, and, if the Amendment was withdrawn, he would move that the power desired by the hon. Member to be placed in the hands of Assistant Registrars should be so placed in the case of Societies registered in Ireland or Scotland exclusively.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Duties and obligations of societies).

MR. MELDON moved, in page 10, line 4, after "office," to insert "in every country where such Society is registered or recorded."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the Amendment unnecessary, the object of the hon. Member being practically met otherwise in the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved an Amendment with regard to auditors. When the Bill was in Committee a proposal was adopted requiring that the names and addresses of the auditors should be sent up to the Registrar, and published by posting a notice in the lodge or board-room of the Society, if any, three months before the period of audit. Since this proposal was embodied in the Bill he had re-this question they were libelling any class of their countrymen. They were not to look at that; what they had to consider was simply whether the legislation was right or wrong. The principle underlying the law in this question was that if you had anything to gain by the death of a person you should not insure the life; for, it was held, by going contrary to this principle the person having an interest in the insured was placed in a position of temptation. The temptation became greater as the person became poorer, and the insured was of a tender age and without power to protect itself. But if the House had determined on one thing, it was for the House to say whether it could alter its opinion.

LORD ESLINGTON said, the recommendations of the Commission were mainly based upon the figures supplied by the Societies; but since the Commission closed its labours the Royal Liver Society had cut the ground completely from under the feet of the Commission. That Society had actually proved, by a laborious investigation, that the percentage of deaths of children insured in that Society was very much less than the percentage outside it. He rejoiced to hear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was resolved to adhere to the wise decision at which the Committee had arrived.

COLONEL MURE observed, that before the Royal Commission respecting factory operatives, a considerable amount of evidence was adduced to show the reckless manner in which the lives of children were frequently sacrificed. He believed that a large number of hon. Members had serious misgivings as to the course which Parliament was now pursuing in regard to the sums to be paid on the death of children, and hoped that the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) would take a division on his Amendment.

DR. C. CAMERON said, the Amendment would not impose any disability upon existing Friendly Societies; it would only prevent new Societies which might spring up hereafter from embarking in the branch of business to which objection was taken.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA pointed out that if children were killed for the sake of the insurance on their lives, the Societies themselves would find the business unprofitable and discontinue it. He could not at all entertain the suspicion that the societies which were interested in the lives of the children could permit themselves to be defrauded by individual members in the manner alleged.

MR. W. HOLMS observed, that a stigma would be cast upon the working classes if the privilege they now enjoyed in respect to insurance were restricted. As to the Report of the Royal Commission on this subject, he must say that he had seldom seen any Report in which conclusions so remarkable were drawn from such a narrow area of observation. They referred to the infant mortality of Liverpool, where Burial Societies were numerous. No doubt it was excessive in that town; but it was equally great in Glasgow, to which they did not refer at all. In both those cities the excessive infant mortality arose, he believed, from causes of a sanitary character.

MR. DODSON recommended that the House should not be put to the trouble of dividing, but negative the Amendment at once.

MR. MUNTZ hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would stand by the proposal in the Bill.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he served on a Commission which inquired into the state of large towns in Lancashire some years ago, and they were greatly struck with the increased number of deaths amongst children who had been insured in Burial Societies, as compared with those who had not been insured at all; and they urged upon the Government to take some steps to prevent the evil. He was prepared to support the Amendment, which did not cast any stigma upon the Friendly Societies, as it proceeded on the same lines as the Gambling Act of the last century, which still prohibited insurance on a life upon which a direct pecuniary interest did not exist.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD WATKIN moved, in page 31, line 12, to insert, "and the sum charged by the registrar of deaths for such certificate shall not exceed one shilling."

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 30, line 36, after the word "pay," to insert the words "any sum of money on the death of a child under six months of age, or shall insure or pay."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. HOPWOOD said, he hoped the Government would stand by the decision which was adopted on the last occasion.

MR. ALEXANDER BROWN said, he could see no reason why the Amendment should not be accepted.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT said, he thought the proper limit was £3, and he was very much surprised when the right hon. Gentleman had given way on that point. This was a minor proposal, but still it was one of great importance. He was quite sure there was a feeling abroad that something ought to be done with regard to burial money for infants. The evil would be partially met if the Amendment were accepted, as he sincerely hoped it would.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made very wise concessions on this point, and they had been most gratefully received by the working classes. He regretted that the poor people of this country had been so grievously libelled. What right had anyone to suppose that they would be tempted to murder their children for the sake of obtaining £6? Why did the House not stop fire insurance because some people burnt down their houses, or marine insurance because ships were sometimes scuttled in order to obtain the insurance money? He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would remain firm on this point, and not accept the Amendment.

MR. HENLEY also thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had acted wisely in the concessions he had made. The Amendment was a retrograde movement. A nasty suspicion had been raised, but no evidence had been published by the Friendly Societies Committee that could justify it. If there was any real suspicion a Commission ought to be issued specially to inquire into it. It reminded him of the Dutch, who at one time first hanged the pirates and tried them afterwards. There was no evidence in support of the suspicion that poor children were neglected or "put away" for the sake of enabling their parents or those who had charge of them to get the insurance money. From a Return lately presented in the House of Lords, it appeared that the mortality of children under five years of age in Liverpool was about 43 per cent on the average of the years in the Return, whereas in the evidence of the Friendly Societies Commission the deaths in a burial society at Liverpool were only 50 per cent up to 10 years of age. He, for one, hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not give way. It would be perpetrating injustice against a large number of our countrymen without any proof whatever that they deserved the stigma. He had a strong feeling in the matter, and he could not help thinking it sad that they should seem to countenance this reflection on the humbler classes of their countrymen without proper inquiry.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the House ought to be guided to a great extent by what had already passed on the subject. The question had created a great deal of interest, and had excited a great deal of discussion when the Bill was in Committee, and the decision then arrived at was viewed as a settlement as far as the present Bill was concerned. Under these circumstances, whatever might be his own feelings with regard to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), he did not think it would be wise to press the House to adopt it. Great care and watchfulness were required with regard to the lives of infants. He did not mean to say that the parents of England were chargeable with the abominable crime of destroying their children for the sake of obtaining a small sum of money, but there were many children of tender age that were not sufficiently cared for; he particularly alluded to the cases of baby-farming and illegitimate children. The question under discussion was whether further precautions ought to be adopted to prevent the mischiefs which happened under the Friendly Societies Acts. The proposals made by the Royal Commission were of a very drastic character, and those proposals had been abandoned so far as the present Bill was concerned, but he believed that those which had been adopted would be efficacious in checking abuses, and did not think it desirable to go one step further. He should, therefore, oppose the Amendment.

SIR HENRY JAMES protested against the idea that in legislating on should oppose the Amendment on the ground that he had in this Bill followed the lines of the County Court in this country. It appeared to him that in legislating for Scotland they ought to consider what was desirable and necessary for that country, irrespective of what might be the case in England.

MR. ANDERSON said, he hoped the Lord Advocate would concede something on this point, because while he was not sure 14 days was the right period, yet he was quite certain 3 days was too short. He suggested that 7 or 10 days might be allowed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was very desirable to bring to a point as soon as possible whether there was to be an appeal or not, and as no inconvenience had arisen from the working of the English County Courts Act, he must oppose the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

And it being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDNANCE SELECT COMMITTEE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY rose to call attention to the present description of heavy guns as supplied for the Navy and for Fortifications, and to move—"That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable the Government should re-appoint the Ordnance Select Committee." He said: Mr. Speaker—In rising, Sir, to call attention to the subject of which I have given Notice, I cannot but be aware that the House will feel that this is a matter of a somewhat technical character, and I know that to many Members it must appear dry and somewhat uninteresting; but whenever the question of Ordnance has been brought forward, this House has always accorded it full and ample discussion. Perhaps, Sir, at no time has it been so necessary as at present that we should take care that we have the very best guns that it is possible to obtain. If we look around us, and bear in mind the results of the late Continental war, we shall find that the importance of artillery has increased very greatly. It has been shown unmistakably that any inferiority in artillery is absolutely fatal, and in a small force like our Army such a defect would be aggravated a thousand-fold. In the Navy we have lately been placing in ships, costing from £250,000 to £500,000, a very diminished number of guns—in many cases not more than from four to six. And when we consider this, we must all look upon it as a question of the most vital importance, that guns so limited in number should be thoroughly efficient, that they should be guns selected by officers thoroughly competent, thoroughly unprejudiced, and thoroughly unbiased. I think, Sir, therefore, that I am right in assuming that I may lay down the fundamental principle, that it is essential in this country that we should have thoroughly efficient guns; the best obtainable for accuracy of fire, for safety, and for simplicity; and that we ought to have them regardless of cost. We have, Sir, lately heard a great many statements of a pessimist character, from gentlemen who seem to look upon everything foreign as being perfect, and everything English as being bad. We have heard statements and theories of a most extraordinary character. We have passed through a little gunnery panic. We have had a score or two of inventors bringing forward their various theories and inventions, many of which have long ago exploded, but for which they have succeeded in finding new adherents and new sympathizers. Sir, we have heard within the last four months that our whole system is wrong. We have heard that our construction is wrong, that we ought to have steel guns rather than wrought iron; and breech-loaders rather than muzzle-loaders; and that we ought to have a different mode of rifling. It seems to me that it would be far better if the official restraint which is put upon those officers who are acquainted with the subject were sometimes removed, and that we should occasionally have some statements contradicting these assertions and showing their absurdity. As it is, the public mind becomes agitated, and we are in great danger occasionally of rushing into useless experiments and wasteful expense. I think we ought to limit this discussion entirely to heavy armour-piercing guns, because if we mix up field guns and great guns we shall be talking of totally different things. The debate which took place in this House a few months ago appeared to me to labour under that difficulty. Every artillerist knows that you cannot discuss a field gun as you would a great gun. You have enormous weights to move, and it is quite possible that the rifling that will do for one gun will be totally wrong for another. Therefore, as far as I can, I will limit this discussion to armour-piercing guns. I have carefully examined all the statements which have been made, and I hope I have thoroughly looked up all the authorities on the question; and, although it is some years since I was a gunnery officer, I hope my opinion will not be found unworthy of consideration. Well, Sir, I cannot help thinking that nearly all these adverse statements are wrong. I am quite certain that, so far as our heavy guns are concerned, comparing them with those of foreign nations, we have as safe a gun, as accurate a gun, and as durable a gun, as there is on the whole of the Continent. But when I say this, I do not wish for one moment to make it appear that our guns are perfect. I know there are many things still required. In the artillery experiments, which are going on daily, we see what improvements may be made. Nor do I think it is possible to put an end to gunnery inventions. We all know that inventions in gunnery come upon us day by day. We must look forward; and while I am anxious to show that our present system—so far I can see—is right, I do hope that we shall take especial care to continue in the right way, and not allow our system to go backwards. My principal object is to press upon the Government the great necessity of appointing an Ordnance Standing Committee of a judicial character, properly constituted, before whom all experiments might be sent; in whose impartiality and well-known scientific attainments the country would have confidence, and with regard to whom inventors would feel that they were dealing with a Committee thoroughly capable and impartial, which would look well into the whole of their proposals. We have—after a most elaborate, most careful, and most painstaking inquiry—decided on a certain system. We have on that conclusion—be it right, or be it wrong—spent a large sum of money, amounting to no less than £4,000,000, in arming our ships and forts, and placing ourselves in the highest state of efficiency. We have spared no money to arrive at this state; and I believe I am correct in saying that at the present moment we have nearly reached a point when we have sufficient guns of the newest pattern and latest calibre to arm the whole of our forts and our entire Navy. Then, Sir, at this point, when we have arrived so near completion, and when we have spent no less than £200,000 in experiments, and £4,000,000 in arming ourselves, we are quietly told that our construction is wrong; that we ought to have breech-loaders instead of muzzle-loaders; and that our rifling is wrong. Well, Sir, it seems to me that very many of these statements which appear daily in the papers, in lectures, and in letters to the public Press, show of themselves the great necessity of having some standing body—some Ordnance Council—before whom these people may be sent, and which would in that way act as a buffer between the Government and inventors, and, indeed, between this House and the inventors. We must remember that in this matter we have been entirely unfettered in our choice. We have had no political or economical reasons to mar our judgment; and if our artillerymen have not got the best guns, all I can say is that they ought to have them. And, looking at the reiterated opinion of all our great artillerists, I cannot help thinking that, if we are wrong, the onus lies upon those who say so to prove it. There is no doubt that inventors are a very peculiar species. They are a most irrepressible class. I know cases in which inventors have come before the late Ordnance Select Committees. They have obtained trials of their inventions. Those trials have gone on for years, and the country has been put to enormous expense; and then when it has been shown that their inventions are useless they have quietly gone home, made some small alteration, and have come before the Committee again and said—“We have entirely altered this; will you try it again?” Naturally officials are sceptical in such cases, and many inventors are now going about in that position. They have had their schemes tried, but because they think they have entirely altered and remodelled them, they come forward again and ask for new trials. They are your principal complainants; they are the people who say you have not got the right gun, and they are the people who try to overthrow and upset the whole of your system. In regard to Ordinance Select Committees, I find on looking back to the year 1797, that it was in that year we had the first Committee which sat off and on until the year 1855. In that year the Duke of Newcastle decided that that Committee was of too military a character, and not sufficiently scientific. He thereupon appointed what is generally called the first Ordinance Select Committee; a committee composed of the Director General, the Naval Director General, heads of Departments, a Lieutenant Colonel, a Captain of Royal Artillery, Officers of Royal Engineers and two civilians. Unfortunately this Committee did not work very well together. No doubt they went through a great many experiments and did a great deal of good; but I believe, Sir, it is generally admitted that the great stumbling block in the way of that Committee was, that you had too many officers upon it—officers who had other duties to perform, and who could not spare the full amount of time which was necessary to devote to that Committee. And, again, there was another reason. You had on that Committee the permanent heads of all your manufacturing Departments. Now it is well known that when an inventor comes before a Select Committee, or a judicial tribunal of that kind, and finds upon it a number of gentlemen whom he regards as rival manufacturers, he naturally thinks that they will not give him a fair and impartial trial. I know, of course—and it has been said to me many times—that our officers are quite unprejudiced. “You must remember,” it is said, “that our officers have nothing whatever in common with the manufacturers. They are paid their ordinary pay, and they have nothing to make by it. They are therefore thoroughly unprejudiced and unbiassed; and the honour of a British officer is far above any sort of petty jobbery or petty spite or prejudice.” But I confess I think the manufacturers and inventors have a fair claim when they say—“Will you let our inventions go before a tribunal which is thoroughly unprejudiced in our eyes. Do not let us have any men on the Committee who are heads of manufacturing establishments.” I do not say I fully share that view, but I know it is a view expressed by very many inventors; and I think it is our object and the object of the Government that every inquiry should be not only full and impartial, but that it should be so considered by those who have to go before it. Well, Sir, in 1859 that Committee was abolished, and another Ordinance Select Committee was appointed of a more limited character, and the heads of Departments were not placed upon it or even attached to it. That Committee sat until the year 1868. They did very great good; but unfortunately the heads of Departments not being in some manner connected with the Committee, they were not consulted in the manner they ought to have been, and became to a certain extent antagonistic. Unluckily, this Committee, to whom we are certainly indebted for nearly all the experiments which have taken place, and, indeed, for having brought us to our present position, seem to have become inventors, and directly they became inventors they naturally lost confidence and became a far less judicial tribunal. In 1868, the Secretary of State for War, Sir John Pakington, now Lord Hampton, thought we had had experiments enough, and that we had come to the time when all those experiments should be made of some use. He thought that, although we had had Blue Book after Blue Book, and experiment after experiment, our armament was entirely in a state of inefficiency, our stores, scattered throughout the world, were all different, and it was absolutely necessary to take some determined stand against all this. He abolished the Ordinance Select Committee. His view seems to have been—“You have now got to that point when it is absolutely necessary to appoint a dictator. You must appoint some man who will carry out your decisions. You must have all your ordinance the same, and you must have all your stores throughout the world on a similar footing.” So General Lefroy was appointed. Soon after that the Conservative Government went out of office. Then Lord Northbrook's Committee sat, and great alterations were made. Amongst other changes, the duties of Director of Ordnance and Superintendent of Stores were handed over to General Sir John Adye. Sir John Adye has had an enormous amount of work to do since that time. It would be presumption on my part to praise so high an official; but I am sure that anybody who has had any dealings with that officer must be well aware of the great care and the great pains he has taken to bring our armaments into a state of efficiency. He has appointed under him officers of great efficiency—officers well up in the experimental department. He has kept at Woolwich three officers—Major Anderson, Major Noble, and Captain Jones—who are well versed in everything that took place under the Ordnance Select Committee, and these officers he has appointed secretaries to small sub-committees. He has, I believe, at the present moment, no less than nine small sub-committees enquiring into different matters. That system undoubtedly has worked very well so far. You have had a man who has been Dictator. He has said—"I am put here to carry that system out, and I will carry it out. I am prepared to go through every experiment, to look at every invention, and to have it thoroughly investigated. I will appoint sub-committees of competent men, who shall examine into all these different things." He has had an Explosive Committee, a Great Gun Committee, and numerous other Committees. But, Sir, whilst that has answered very well, I doubt very much indeed whether it is a permanent institution. I doubt whether what we have seen lately is not the first beginning of an agitation in which we shall soon find ourselves involved. We shall have inventors coming to the door of this House and to the public Press maintaining that our system is wrong. We have seen at this door inventors complaining daily, and asking Members of the House to go up to their own houses to look at inventions which they say have been refused a fair trial. I do not think that is a satisfactory state of things. Then, again, I would ask, is it fair to the heads of your manufacturing departments that they should be divided into these small sub-committees, and asked to devote their time to other matters than their own duty; to spend a great number of hours in investigating questions, no doubt of great importance, but questions far apart from their manufacturing business, and questions which ought not to come immediately under their cognizance? I know, of course, that these gentlemen do their duty, but many of them must do it grudgingly. They know that this is hardly their duty, and you cannot get that full amount of investigation and care which you would get if you had a Council or Select Committee whose sole duty it was to go thoroughly into each of these matters. Sir, as I have already said, I do not wish in any way to make the slightest reflection upon Sir John Adye. I know he has done everything he possibly could do, and has carried out the experimental branch as far as practicable. I would suggest that if you have a Select Committee you should appoint two civilians. I have been told by gentlemen in manufacturing districts—"Oh! these inventors receive no fair play. Your officers were all prejudiced. What you want is some mechanical engineer to inquire into the matter." I have endeavoured to explain the absurdity of this, but I have said at the same time, "there cannot be any objection to having one or two mechanical engineers of the highest standing on such a Committee." If you appoint two engineers of great standing, far above any petty clique, or any petty prejudice for or against any one inventor or other, I am quite sure you will be doing not only great good to the officers of the Committee, but what would be only just and fair to the inventors and country at large. It may be said that you would not be able to get these engineers; but I cannot help thinking that if you paid them tolerably well you would get them. Of course, you must pay them. A Select Committee must be well paid, but it will be comparatively a very small amount. We talk of the expense of an Ordnance Select Committee when they are investigating cases costing thousands of pounds. If you fire a 38-ton gun only once the charge is £10; and that is only a small case. You can waste thousands of pounds in a very short time, and unless you have thoroughly competent men to deal with these experiments you will waste a great deal more with unsatisfactory results. The principal reason for asking for this Committee is this:—you have spent £200,000 in experiments, and £4,000,000 or nearly so in arming yourselves. It is quite possible that if you are not careful, you may find yourselves suddenly obliged to undertake some great alteration. You may, whether you like it or not, have changes thrust upon you; and you may be in that unfortunate position which I remember we were placed in a few years ago, when we were told by hon. Gentlemen in this House—"Oh! America is the country that you ought to get your guns from. They have gone through a great war; they have seen what guns are fit to do; and they are far better judges than we are." It is well known how that resulted. We unfortunately spent a good deal of money in proving and trying a 15-inch gun, and the result was nil. Since that we have had a very interesting Report issued, and in which the Committee of the Senate and Congress of the United States tell you what they consider had been the result of their own ordnance. I only mention this because it shows what had been done in a case of panic, and what may occur again unless you have some judicial tribunal before whom these matters may be placed. In that Report to Congress, dated February 15, 1869, they say that—

"Each system of guns introduced into our service . . . has failed when submitted to the real test of service; that 'experience had shown them to be inferior in range and penetration to the guns of foreign Powers, and unreliable as to endurance.' 'That the Rodman system of gun-making, while partially successful in smooth-bores and small calibres, has so far failed in rifles of large calibre as to show it to be unworthy of further confidence. Recent improvements in defensive works and armour-plating render heavy rifled guns the most efficient means of attack, and no system of fabrication which does not furnish such guns should be adopted or continued.' That 'the present system' of procuring ordnance 'has failed to answer the purpose for which it was designed, and the United States is in the position to-day of a nation having a vast coast-line to defend and a large Navy without a single rifled gun of large calibre, and a corps of ordnance officers who have thus far failed to discover a remedy for the failure of the guns, or to master the rudiments of the science in which they have been trained at the public expense.' 'In the operations upon Morris Island,' says the Report, '22 large guns was the greatest number mounted at one time, yet 50 in all burst during the siege, as is shown by the evidence of General Gillmore. In the attack on Fort Fisher all the Parrott guns in the Fleet burst, according to the report of Admiral Porter. By the bursting of five of these guns at the first bombardment, 46 persons were killed and wounded, while only 11 were killed and wounded by the projectiles from the enemy's guns during the attack.'"

I think that is very important as showing how entirely fallacious some of the arguments are—of a pessimist character, which we often hear against our system. I have looked through Hansard and found speech after speech praising these American guns, and I think only one Gentleman, the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), expressed grave doubts on the subject and said he believed that we were right, and the Americans wrong. But notwithstanding his speech, the Government of the day were forced into expenditure to get a certain number of these guns, and trials of them were made. If this Committee is appointed, in order to overcome the difficulty of heads of Departments being permanently attached to the Committee, and so being to a certain extent rivals of some inventors, and at the same time in order to enable you to have the great benefit which must be derived from having the opinions of officers of so much authority and so much practical knowledge of the different subjects before you, I would suggest that you should attach to the Committee your different heads of Departments, but that they should not be permanent officers of the Committee, but ex officio members without a vote. I think if you did that you would avoid any difficulty. Now, let us see how far I was right in saying that I believe we have as good a gun as there is to be found on the Continent. I do not, as I said before, move for an Ordnance Council, because I think our guns are bad, and that therefore there must be a Committee of Inquiry; but I do so because I believe our guns to be on a very proper system, and I think we ought to have a Select Committee in order to maintain and expand that position. We have been told—"You must be wrong. Look abroad. Every foreign country has a different system from yours. Every foreign country has adopted steel guns. Every foreign country, or nearly all the principal ones, have adopted the Krupp guns." Well, Sir, I have gone into this matter, and I believe I am right in saying that in Italy they have got our guns; they have them in Spain, in Holland, in Denmark, in Norway, in Portugal, in Egypt, in the Turkish Navy, in Chili, and in Peru they have them. Of course, I shall be told—"Oh, but you have left out the four great countries, Germany.

Russia, France, and Austria." That is quite right. No doubt, those four countries have adopted a different system from ours. But first of all, I believe I am right in saying that France does not agree with the other three any more than with us, and, as for field artillery, has at present come to no determination. At any rate, whilst many of her officers would like muzzle-loaders, she knows that there is such a strong feeling in favour of what is called the successful gun on the Continent, that she must keep a breech-loading gun. Austria at the present moment is in a most awkward position. They cannot come to any conclusion whatever, and do not know whether to adopt the Krupp, or some other gun. In Germany, undoubtedly, you have got the Krupp gun, but you must remember that in Germany you have no other manufacturer as against Krupp. Essen is the great national establishment. It has been the aim and ambition of Germany for many years to make a great national arsenal. They have fostered it, and have done their utmost to make Krupp the great national gun factory; but, although during the late wars they had considerable experience of field guns, they have as yet had no experience in heavy guns. But the Krupp has the name of being the successful gun on the Continent. Germany is fostering it, and undoubtedly they have produced some very good guns. What is our construction? Our construction, as is well known, is obtained from Sir William Armstrong. His plan has been adopted and carried out, of bars of wrought iron laid one on the other and welded together, so that all the parts bear an equal strain. That system has been modified by alterations from Fraser, from Sir William Palliser, from the French system, and from other sources. The merit of our construction—the construction of our present Woolwich gun—is that it gives us what we may look upon as a leathery gun. It is a gun which is a safe gun. It is different from the steel gun in so far as it never bursts explosively, and long before it can burst you are made aware by a slight crack that something is wrong. But no gun we have had in service has burst. In Germany, however, we have records of many of these steel guns bursting. You know that steel guns have burst continually, and that havoc and consternation has been spread around wherever that happened. I think we ought to lay very great stress upon the advantage of having a safe gun. I have read just now a quotation from a report to Congress mentioning the large number of guns which burst during the American Civil War. Sir, I do not think anybody connected with the Navy or with fortifications would dream of putting any gun into a ship or fort if they had the slightest idea that it would burst. I cannot imagine anything more dreadful or more fatal to steadiness than a captain of a gun feeling he had a machine to work, in which he had not complete confidence. For although 99, as Lord Cardwell said the other day, out of 100 were sound, yet if the hundredth burst it would be a blot on the whole system. On board ship, if a gun burst not only would it do an immense deal of harm on board that particular ship, but the alarm would spread like wild-fire through the Fleet; and I am sure that the Admiralty responsible for the construction of such a gun would rue the day. But I shall be told, of course—"Oh, but steel is yet in its infancy, and in due time these guns will take a place in our armaments." I do not doubt that steel is in its infancy. No one can doubt that steel is gradually assuming large proportions. We are gradually using steel for boilers; by-and-by we shall doubtless have steel armour-plates, steel plates for ships; and steel will take a large position in shipbuilding operations. That may be true, but at the present moment steel has not arrived at that stage. It is true that Sir Joseph Whitworth states that his compressed steel is beyond all doubt the metal of which you ought to make your guns. But I am told—and I think I had it from Sir Joseph Whitworth himself—that he is not yet prepared to make large guns of that metal. I say that with diffidence, because I am not quite certain; but of this I am confident, that up to this moment no heavy gun like our heavy ordnance has been made of compressed steel, which has been thoroughly proved and tested. I do not for one moment wish to cast the slightest imputation or doubt upon Sir Joseph Whitworth. He is a great mechanic, and what he says he will do, I have no doubt he will eventually carry out. Still, for a number of years we have heard a great deal of compressed steel and of yellow and homogeneous metal, without ever hearing of its obtaining a market value. Are there any guns of steel which you could be perfectly certain would not burst when they are made? Krupp guns undoubtedly are of steel; but Krupp has lately been obliged to strengthen even his smallest guns with steel hoops, and Krupp has never allowed his guns to be proved in the same way that ours have been proved. We prove our guns as we do our boilers—with a large surplus charge; but having made great inquiries I find that on the Continent practically they are not proved at all. In the Mediterranean Fleet I made inquiry, and I have been unable to find any single officer who had ever seen German guns fired at a target. I understand that in Russia they actually will not allow these large guns to be proved. They have now obtained from this country two testing machines that test guns by hydraulic power up to seven or eight tons to the square inch; but it is well known that we prove our guns up to 30 tons, and sometimes even up to 60 tons. I think this will show that however much Krupp may have succeeded in making his guns sound, he has not succeeded in making them sufficiently sound to give entire confidence either to himself or the Germans; and certainly in Russia, where they make a similar gun, they have not shown the same confidence that they would have done if they had proved them in the same manner that we do. And now, Sir, I shall be told—"That may be all very well. You may have a very safe gun; you may have a gun which has never been known to burst on service; but you ought to adopt the breech-loader. Why adopt the muzzle-loader? The muzzle-loader is, of necessity, a very slow means of firing; and you want a rapid fire. You want guns that you can load quickly, and which will be under cover." I find that on the question of rapid firing popular opinion is in favour of a breech-loading gun. I am told that the great aim of the breech-loader is to enable you to have rapidity of fire. In discussing this question I have alluded solely to heavy guns. We must remember that we have not got here a small breech-piece, that we can screw in and out from time to time. You have an enormous block of metal that you have to take out and put back. It is all very well talking of a 7 or even 9-inch gun, but when you come to a 35-ton gun with a breech-piece weighing one ton, you will have great difficulty in getting that in and out. And when you come to a heavier gun—an 80-ton gun—you find that your breech-piece weighs no less than three tons. As regards rapidity of fire, I find that in Germany it is considered sufficient that you should be able to fire a large gun once in three minutes. I do not say there is any great necessity for firing more quickly, but I mean that three minutes is considered by the Germans to be the very quickest rate at which you could possibly fire your breech-loading gun. I have made inquiries as to what our muzzle-loading guns are able to do, and although I have no desire to trouble the House with many quotations, I hope I may be allowed to make this. I find that on board the Resistance an 8-inch gun, with the ship rolling during this time through an arc of 25 degrees, 10 to 11 times a minute, fired 8 rounds in 8 minutes and 14 seconds. I find in the Minotaur, that a 9-inch and a 12-ton gun each fired 8 rounds in 8 minutes and 26 seconds. These, then, are your muzzle-loaders which are said to have no rapidity of fire. They hit the target each time. In the Iron Duke, a 9-inch gun fired 8 rounds in 5 minutes and 23 seconds, and also hit the target each time. I find that the Devastation, which is a turret ship with the largest guns at present afloat—35-ton guns—and is now in the Mediterranean, actually fired with these enormous guns 8 rounds in 14 minutes and 48 seconds, steaming round the target and rolling slightly—good shooting. Such rapidity of fire is really enormous. On land we have had an experiment with a 35-ton gun in a casemate where, although they were crowded so closely, it fired at 2,000 yards, 3 rounds in 6 minutes and 30 seconds. Of course, being in a very limited space, it was not so quick as those on board ship. I think that will show that at any rate with regard to rapidity of fire our muzzle-loaders are far superior to the breech-loaders; and I have it on the very best authority that some of our greatest artillerists think that one reason for deprecating breech-loaders is, that instead of giving rapidity of fire, they very much impede your firing. Well, I am told that with breech-loaders there is a great saving of labour, because as the breech mechanism is so simple you are able to load with fewer people. But that is simply not the case. There is one thing which I ought not to lose sight of on the other side of the question. We have lately been experimenting with an invention which has been made by Mr. Rendel, one of the partners in the Armstrong firm, who has applied hydraulic power to loading and working guns in a manner that seems likely to revolutionize gunnery. That has certainly altered the argument very much against breech-loading. I have, thanks to the kindness of the First Lord of the Admiralty, seen this system myself of working guns on board ship, not only in harbour, but at sea firing. I have seen on board the Thunderer a 38-ton gun fired in a turret and worked for some little time, and I think everybody was perfectly satisfied. By the system of hydraulic loading you obtain an enormous saving of labour; for instead of having 20 men, six men are quite sufficient; and instead of having your power crowded in a small turret, you are able to take your motive power down to the main deck; a small pipe will convey, round any intricate turnings, water for the loading apparatus. Of course, here again we are told that this mechanism is complicated and that we had better have the breech-loader, because this hydraulic system will never answer. But this hydraulic system is not complicated and is very simple. I may be asked—"You will have it shot away, and then where will you be?" My answer is, that you have two, one on each side, and that there is no more danger than of the turret turn-table being shot away. It has this very great advantage. You are able to have as long a gun in your turret as you like, for you load from the outside, and there is no necessity therefore for leaving any special amount of space in your turret; and I am informed—though I will not vouch for it—that you are able to have a longer muzzle-loader than a breech-loader. Of course, it will be said that for a breech-loader you might have hydraulic loading also; but the thing here is that you have actually now got the simple muzzle-loader, which you are able to work so easily with this beautiful machinery. The House will hardly believe that with this hydraulic loading a gun mounted exactly in the same way as these heavy guns in the Thunderer, has been loaded and worked in 29 seconds. I do not mean to say that it was actually fired, but it was for all practical purposes; and I am told on the authority of the officers who worked the guns that they have no hesitation in saying that with hydraulic loading this could be carried out on board the Thunderer in 45 seconds. If you arrive at that, or anything like that, I am certain the House will agree that nothing more is required. An objection is taken that on board the Thunderer we had great depression, which it is said will, with a premature bursting of the cartridge, send the shot through the bottom of the vessel. That is the absurd notion which has appeared in some papers; but it is not well founded. I know that in "another place" a statement was made that the gun was depressed 50 degrees, but it was only depressed 11 degrees; and if a charge were to go off, the shot would go clear of the water line. And that was only an experimental case. The Thunderer was made first, and the hydraulic system was fitted to it. The Inflexible, which you are now building, will only have a depression of three degrees, if not less; and, therefore, when you build a ship for your gun, there is no difficulty whatever. When you fit your gun to your ship there is, of course, more difficulty. One great advantage of this system is that you are able gradually to diminish your armour. In the Inflexible you are making the turrets with 18 inches of armour plate, whereas the armour plate at the water line is 24 inches. There is one point in this system of breech-loading which I know an hon. Friend of mine is very fond of urging, and that is the importance of cover. He says that, with a muzzle-loader, your men will be shot away, because you have no cover; but in a turret, with the hydraulic system, there can be no danger of that. But one or two men are in the turret, which is turned away from the point where you receive fire, and they are perfectly safe. The rest are all on the maindeck below, from which the loading is effected. But it is argued that, with broadside guns, the men loading them must be shot away. Surely the answer to that is simply that you have to run your gun in and lower your ports,

and then your men will not be shot away. We have been told that a great number of men were killed at Liessa owing to this wretched system. I have made inquiries, and have not been able to hear of any men wounded with rifle balls in that engagement. With siege guns, too, you may be perfectly under cover by adopting the system of firing over a high parapet with the Moncrieff, or similar plan. I will not trouble the House much longer; but there is one point on which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Devonport will have something to say. That is the question of windage. No doubt, in a muzzle-loader, you have a considerable amount of windage, while in a breech-loader it is entirely prevented. The result is that in a muzzle-loader you have a certain amount of gas erosion; and according to the theory of the officers who adopt that view, your gun is very much deteriorated. But, Sir, what are the facts according to the experiments which have been made? Within the last year they have discovered a system of gas check which closes the windage and stops erosion, and increases the initial velocity by 30 feet; and you have also got a vent plug, which prevents the gas rushing out through the vent, and gives 6 feet additional initial velocity, so that you get over that difficulty. Experiments with both these inventions are now being carried out. I know my hon. and gallant Friend will be able to say a great deal in regard to erosion, and a great deal as to the question of rifling, and as to whether you ought to have a uniform twist instead of one accelerated twist, and so on; but I think these are mere matters of detail, which ought to be left for the inquiry of a Scientific Committee. With regard to the power of endurance, Returns issued this morning show that the question of endurance has assumed a more satisfactory aspect than I had any idea of. It will be seen from those Returns, giving particulars of all heavy armour-piercing guns, from your 7-inch 6½-ton gun to your 35-ton gun, that no less than 592 of those guns have fired over 100 rounds. As to the 7-inch gun, 367 of these have fired over 100 rounds, and five have fired over 1,000 rounds, and one has fired 2,342 rounds. One of these has been provisionally condemned, and one required new tubing after firing 1,770 rounds. Of the 8-inch 9-ton guns, although not largely employed, 89 have fired over 100 rounds each, and up to 753 rounds and 1,918 rounds, and none have been found unserviceable. The 9-inch 12½-ton gun will pierce every Russian ship except Peter the Great and the Kreutzer at 200 yards; while at 600 yards she will pierce every French, German, and Italian ship, every Dutch ship except the Buffel, and every Norwegian ship except three. Of these, 97 guns have fired over 100 rounds; 23 over 400; 5 over 1,000; and 12 have averaged 818 rounds. And now I come to the 10-inch 18-ton gun. I find that this gun will pierce at 500 yards every foreign ship afloat except Peter the Great and the Kreutzer, and that it will also pierce our own Hercules. Of this gun 14 have fired over 100 rounds; 1 gun has fired 693 rounds; and 1 has fired 889 rounds. Two of them required re-tubing after 534 rounds and 425 rounds respectively. We will, no doubt, hear a great deal about re-tubing from my hon. and gallant Friend; but he will find that only this very limited number required re-tubing. It was stated that an enormous number of the guns required re-tubing; and a statement appeared in the papers that a large number of the guns of the Hercules were hors de combat, and must be re-tubed. It turned out, however, that the gentleman who had made the statement, and delivered a most interesting lecture, had seen the broad arrow in the Return, and that he had mistaken the meaning of "serviceable," and had thus been led to an entirely wrong conclusion. A number of people that heard the statement made came away with the opinion that a large number of our guns would have to be re-tubed. I find that we have eight 25-ton guns in use which have fired from 100 to 485 rounds each. With regard to the 35-ton gun. Only six of these have been fired over 100 rounds, one over 207 rounds. The 38-ton gun has been fired 247 rounds. The general result is that 592 heavy armour guns have fired 20 per cent more shot rounds than their full complement. In reference to the comparison of the power of penetration, I will not trouble the House at length; but if you take the German gun and the English gun—if you take the 28-centimetre gun and the 11-inch English gun, with a 10-inch iron target, the German gun would pierce it at 1,400 yards, while our 11-inch gun would pierce the same target at 1,600 yards. It must be borne in mind that our gun is two tons lighter, and that it has an immense amount of windage. The Return shows that, so far as experiments have gone, we have strong and powerful guns. I do not know that I need trouble the House with anything else except the question of cost. I have said that our guns are safe, simple, and powerful—that they are as good as can be got on the Continent; and I think, also, we shall be able to conclude that they are economical. I said at first that while it is necessary to have our armaments thoroughly efficient it is necessary to secure that efficiency, even without regard to the question of cost, and that we must have the best guns irrespective of expense. I find, however, in going into the question of cost, that our guns made at Woolwich are considerably cheaper than those made in Germany. Taking the 12-inch 35-ton gun, its cost at Woolwich is £2,156; the same gun at Krupp's establishment in Germany would cost £7,400. The 11-inch 25-ton gun costs at Woolwich £1,589; in Germany it costs £5,520. The 9-inch 12-ton gun costs at Woolwich £1,000, in Germany it costs £3,120. The result is that if we had armed with breech-loader German guns, and if they had supplied our guns instead of our making them ourselves, our armament, instead of costing £4,000,000 would have cost considerably over £7,000,000. I have now to thank the House for the kind manner in which they have heard me. I have endeavoured to show, as far as I could, that our guns are thoroughly satisfactory; but I by no means think that we would be justified in reducing our experiments or continuing satisfied with the present state of things. I think we ought to carry them on more rigidly than ever, and to look carefully into all questions affecting our armaments; and if the Ordnance Council which I propose, think that the system of breech-loading should be gone into, there could be no objection to have a gun of that class made at Woolwich, one by Sir William Armstrong, and others by other English manufacturers. We can obtain breech-loading guns without going to the Continent, and it is a long time since any system of breech-loading was tried in England. I am quite sure that if we had an Ordnance Committee acting in a judicial capacity, we should have no difficulty in getting the breech-loading system thoroughly tried. I hope the House will agree to the re-appointment of this Ordnance Committee. I am certain that it would be an immense boon to the Government. I am quite certain it would be a saving of expense—that it would be far better to have such a tribunal to hear the complaints of inventors, and that in all respects it would be more satisfactory than the present state of things. I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

MR. SAMUDA seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable the Government should reappoint the Ordnance Select Committee."—(Mr. Hanbury Tracy.)

CAPTAIN G. E. PRICE, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the condition of our heavy ordnance is such as to demand the serious consideration of the Government; and that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the best means of supplying the Navy with guns of a more reliable and efficient nature," said, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend that in regard to the question of endurance the conditions between light and heavy guns were entirely different; and there was also a great difference in the conditions required in the naval and in the land service guns respectively. If they compared the endurance of such breech-loading guns as they now heard of on the Continent and that of the muzzle-loading guns which were at present issued to our service, the comparison was much in favour of the former. As to the difference between the two systems in respect to the danger from rifle fire, that danger was easily guarded against on board ship. In dealing with the question of breech as compared with muzzle-loading, the hon. Member said that as regarded guns of moderate calibre, say of under 12 tons, whose projectiles could be lifted by human power, it really did not much matter which system of loading was adopted; but where the projectile was of such a weight that machinery had to be employed to raise it, all naval officers were unanimous in condemning the system of muzzle-loading for guns on board ship. The advocates of the breech-loading system were met by the objection that to change our system would entail an enormous expense, and would subject us to all the dangers arising out of a prolonged state of transition from one system to the other, while, at the same time, our guns were so good that there was no necessity for changing the system of loading. He joined issue at once with regard to the accuracy of those assertions. Some weeks ago the Surveyor General of the Ordnance had informed him that the authorities were so well satisfied with the present system that they intended to apply it to the larger guns that were now being manufactured. That satisfaction was not shared by artillerymen or men of science either in this country or abroad. The hon. Member then proceeded to quote the opinions of gentlemen of scientific eminence, who, he said, were unanimous in their condemnation of the Woolwich system of rifling guns. This country could not afford to despise the opinion and the example of foreign countries. It must not be forgotten that steam line-of-battleships and armour plating were first adopted by the French, and that we had followed the example of the Prussians in adopting breech-loading small arms. Captain Simpson, of the United States Navy, who had been at the head of the American Commission appointed to inquire into the merits of the different systems of Artillery adopted in Europe, stated in his Report that our Woolwich guns were safe, but were short-lived. In 1866 the Ordnance Select Committee carried out a series of exhaustive experiments in order to ascertain the respective merits of the Woolwich, the Scott, the Lancaster, and of another gun. The Report of the Committee on Rifled Guns stated that the Woolwich guns, or guns rifled on the French system, had a lower velocity than the Lancaster or Scott gun—the difference between 1,600 feet per second as compared with 1,529 feet per second—the real difference in penetrating power being as the weight of the shot multiplied into the square of the velocity, which would make the difference very great indeed. With respect to accuracy, the experiments were slightly in favour of the Woolwich gun. With respect to naval guns, their best quality was not extent of range. According to Admiral Cooper Key, the best quality of a naval gun was endurance, the next was penetrating power, the next ability to use a powerful shell, the next simplicity; then followed accuracy of range under 1,500, and the last of all was extent of range. If that were so, there was a great difference between the gun required for the naval and for the land services. On the Committee of which he spoke of eight officers, but one was connected with the Navy; whether that officer agreed with his colleagues he had no means of knowing; but this he knew—that the Admiralty of the day rejected the system, and that since that time the 7-inch gun had been constructed on the uniform twist. The lifetime of the Woolwich gun had been variously stated in that House as being from 250 to 370 or 375 rounds. He would be glad to take it as at the highest figure, but could not do so, as the Reports before the House showed that no experiment tried would warrant him in doing so. The facts he had adduced proved that we stood in a very dangerous position. Under the head of "endurance" they had "no test" or successive alterations of the gun. Endurance, however, meant the number of rounds a gun would fire without requiring repair, and what he feared was that our great ironclads would have to leave the seat of war, if war broke out, after firing 100 rounds of each of their guns, or, at all events, after a single naval engagement. Well, then, it might be asked, what would those guns do? They were told that they would penetrate so many inches of iron at a distance of so many hundred yards. So they would, but they would only do so when they struck the iron plate under certain conditions and angles, and when they struck point foremost. This was partly owing to their shape, their weak construction, and their extreme irregularity of flight. There was something to be taken into consideration in respect to the shape of the shot. In the museum of Sir Joseph Whitworth was a plate of iron perforated by two different kinds of shot—the one pointed and the other flat-headed. They were both fired from a gun of the same weight of metal and with the same charge of powder; but while the pointed shot failed to penetrate and glanced off except when it struck at an angle of 30 degrees, the flat-headed shot continued to penetrate at 50 degrees, and even as much as 65 degrees off the perpendicular. What would be the result, in the event of a vessel of the type of the Alexandra engaging a vessel like the Brazilian frigate recently built? The Alexandra would be armed with the Woolwich infant and would fire pointed shot, and the Brazilian frigate would fire flat-headed shot. Long before the Alexandra would be in a position in which her guns would be of any use she would be hulled through at every discharge of the Brazilian flat-headed projectiles. He might be asked what he thought was the cause of the defects he had pointed out in the endurance and penetrating power of our guns. Well, he would answer to that—and he had abundant evidence to prove it—that they were almost entirely due to the system of rifling which the Ordnance Select Committee adopted in 1866 and which gave the lowest initial velocity. This system was brought over from France and the Admiralty objected to it. The want of endurance and penetrating power of our guns was also owing in a great degree to the nature of the shot. It was proved that the great danger to a gun arose not from erosion, but from the local scoring that turned to cracking of the tube. The studs upon the shot hit the tube a violent blow, and the shot being started with great velocity was then by the system of rifling required to make a sudden turn. Hon. Members might advantageously consult on this subject the Reports made by Colonel Smythe of the Royal Artillery of the experiments made in India in 1872, when two guns burst. There was also great irregularity in the powder-pressure, and the shot was consequently irregular in its flight after leaving the gun. The damage done to the inside of the gun by the “wobbling” of the shot also caused irregularity in the flight of the shot. The House would remember the experiments with the Hotspur, when she fired her 35-ton gun at a painted mark in the centre of the turret of the Glatton. The distance was 200 yards and the sea was smooth, but the third shot missed, owing to the spiral direction attained by the shot after leaving the bore of the gun. The shot went straight enough for long distances. The corkscrew then straightened itself and the shot went straight to the mark. But it was no part of the duty of our officers to get a good way off an enemy, and we wanted a gun which would be equally effective at short and long distances. He would be told that we were making great improvements. We had been making improvements for the last 12 years, but what had been the result. The experiments had resulted in the gun which he had attempted to describe. The hon. Member moved for the re-appointment of the Ordnance Select Committee; but the great defects in our system would not be cured in this way. It was not to them the House could look for a remedy, for it was to them that these defects were due. What we required was a perfectly unbiassed Committee, and he hoped that in future it would have upon it a greater number of naval officers; for hitherto, of the 15 or 16 members of the Committee, only one or two had been naval officers, and yet, if the guns came to be fired in earnest, the chances were that in 99 cases out of 100 it was naval officers who would have to work them. He would have a Committee of both Houses; they should decide what experiments should be made and what expenses should be allowed; and then a Board might be appointed to carry out the experiments. If it were decided that we could get as much as we wanted out of the muzzle-loader with improved mechanism, no great expense need be incurred, and the guns might be rifled on a mechanical plan. He hoped that never again would there be presented to Parliament a Report showing that our guns had not been practically tested with such charges as would be used in service.

Amendment proposed.

To leave out from the word “House” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the condition of our heavy ordnance is such as to demand the serious consideration of the Government; and that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the best means of supplying the Navy with guns of a more reliable and efficient nature,”—(Captain Price),—instead thereof.

MR. E. J. REED said, the House could not discuss any question of more enduring importance. It had been his lot to have much to do with our system of ordnance, and to see many of its shortcomings, and he certainly had never expected to hear a naval officer move a Resolution in favour of our present guns. He was amazed alike at the introduction of our present system and at the continuance of it. The wonder was that human ingenuity had been able to overcome a system so false even to a tolerable extent. Whether they regarded the gun or the projectile from a mechanical point of view, they seemed to be wrong in almost every respect; and it was no wonder that so many shells had been found to burst. The origin of all the difficulty had been touched upon, and it was that the Ordnance Select Committee, instead of being a body of reference and of a judicial character, had turned itself into a body of schemers and partizans, and at one time the War Office went so far as to have a committee of inventors. Amid the diversity of opinions which existed on this question, it was very desirable to seek for some sound leading principles. In the first place, with regard to the constitution of the Committee which was to advise the Government, there were three things perfectly obvious. The guns had to be manufactured under the War Department, and therefore it was most natural that the officers of that Department should have something to say on the subject. Again, naval officers alone had experience at sea of the guns to be used, and of the defects which might be found in them, and, therefore, any advising body should have naval officers upon it. In the third place, as the construction of guns was a mechanical operation, persons skilled in mechanical operations should be also on the Committee. But then the last thing we ought to do was to substitute any Committee for the responsible Minister. One of the most serious disadvantages which the country had laboured under was that we had had so many subordinate bodies and Committees which had done so much, and that we had not been able to get the responsible Minister himself to devote time and attention to the subject. He hoped the present Secretary of State for War would find an opportunity of giving his personal attention to this question. Then, our guns should be made of the best material, and he would remark that it was high time that those references to iron and steel which were of such frequent occurrence in our debates should be dropped out. It was well known that there were materials of various grades and qualities, which it would puzzle people to define as iron or steel, but which, possessing the best qualities of both, might be used for the purpose. The Government were at this moment doing a most valuable work in building ships of what was called steel, but what was really a material between iron and steel, with the superior and none of the inferior qualities of each. He would say no more about such a material than this—that it was known to the world to possess more thoroughly than any other the qualities which would be required for the construction of a gun; and when he was under official responsibility he took some pains to bring that material to the knowledge of the Government. He would now come to the projectile, and would speak of one point which would condemn utterly the existing system of ordnance. A long shot when fired with the very same charge of powder as a short shot produced a penetrative effect vastly in excess of an ordinary short shot. But our system of rifling debarred us from using long shot. If the Government had adopted some years ago that other system of rifling which would be in the minds of those who had studied the question they might have enormously increased the power of our ships. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) had frankly admitted that any change in ordnance which would have to apply to the whole armament of the Navy would necessarily entail enormous expense; but he (Mr. Reed) maintained it was not a question of expense at all when you were dealing with a new ship. Take, for instance, the Inflexible. Why should we not adopt with regard to the very exceptional ordnance of that ship a system which would give us a penetrative and destructive power which would be vastly in excess of what could be obtained by adhering to the old system? He did not know how it happened that when men got into a responsible position they failed to see the force of commonplace arguments that seemed to him to strike every mind that gave attention to them. This question was one of great importance now, when other Powers, even secondary Powers, were adopting guns which would give them a very superior advantage indeed. Unless we altered our present course, we should find ourselves in this position—that Brazil sent into European waters guns pretty nearly double the power of our own guns of equal weight and size. He remembered that when a Minister was once proposing the Navy Estimates he spoke of providing a 12½-ton gun, but he spoke of the 6½-ton gun as more eligible, because it could be worked more satisfactorily; but recent experience had shown that the largest guns in the service were those which were now most easily worked.

The guns, in fact, of the Heracles and her sister ships, which were the largest of all, were so; and so it would be, he could not help thinking, with breech-loading guns, the question in reference to which ought not to be treated as if they could derive no advantage from mechanical power. If breech-loading guns were to be kept out of the service, it would arise from some more substantial cause than that. For his part, believing as he did that the gun ought to be loaded at the breech and not at the muzzle, he hoped that breech-loaders would not be long kept out of the service. The great question was to know how they were to get the improvements which the country contained and comprised into the minds and proposals of the Government. That was the difficulty, and with a view to remove it he was anxious that there should be interposed between the Government and their ordinary advisers a Parliamentary Committee, who should make a thorough and independent inquiry into the subject, and he therefore supported the Amendment before the House. With the facts so obtained before him the Minister could then act on his own responsibility. Her Majesty's Government would, he believed, reflect honour on their administration by yielding to the solicitations addressed to them that evening from both sides of the House.

MAJOR BEAUMONT thought that changes should not be introduced in a hurry. The important propositions laid down by the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) were equally applicable to the subject whether the breech-loading or the muzzle-loading system was adopted for our guns. The desirability of using the one system or the other depended upon the description of gun that was used. In the case of the field-gun the question of cover was not of the same importance as in that of the heavier guns. A gun in the open could be served as well from the muzzle as from the breech, but the reverse of that was the case with respect to heavy guns. The Government had been wise, he thought, in the course they adopted in taking advantage of the simplicity offered by the muzzle-loading gun and in pinning their faith to that system for field guns; but the circumstances became changed when they considered the question of heavy guns. As they increased the size of their guns they increased the strain upon them, and must therefore seek to increase their strength. Beyond a certain point they could not do this, and had therefore been driven to use a milder description of powder, which drove them to the use of a longer barrel for the gun. He maintained that the gun at Woolwich which had attracted so much attention would not be the only one of its type. Could this be done without some system of breech-loading? Considering the question with reference to fortifications, unfortunately our fortifications were already built, and we had begun to put our guns in them; but we could barely get in our largest guns, and at this moment a Committee was sitting at Shoeburyness to consider the best means of loading them after they had been got into the fortifications. He feared they would have to diminish the speed of the projectiles, or to increase the size of the casements, or to take some system of breech-loading. They should seek to get a good system of breech-loading. He agreed with the hon. Member for Pembroke that it would be very satisfactory if the Secretary of State for War turned his personal attention to these questions; but with all his ability he could scarcely be expected to grapple with them without some professional assistance. He could not support the re-appointment of the Ordnance Select Committee, which to his mind partook too much of an experimental character. He should regret that the re-appointment of the Ordnance Select Committee upon a side issue should revive it in a permanent form, believing as he did that, though it had done good service in its time, it was better for the Service that it should be dead and gone. He was more inclined to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of breech-loaders as against muzzle-loaders; and he should prefer that their attention should be directed to guns both for land and sea service. But it was a most difficult question to take up. He very much doubted whether any inquiry could ever really decide the matter, for it could not be decided on purely theoretical grounds. What he thought would be the best way out of the difficulty was to appeal to the great inventive power of the country by the Government offering a reward of sufficient amount to stimulate inventors to produce a breech-loading gun equal in penetrating power to our muzzle-loaders; for the reason why we had abolished breech-loading guns was because we could not get them to stand mechanically the strain they had to bear. If a Committee were appointed, no doubt a great amount of scientific information would be obtained; but he doubted if a satisfactory settlement of the question would thereby be attained.

GENERAL SHUTE remarked that the hon. Member who had just sat down had implied that the question of the cover to men who were loading given by the breech-loading system was of little importance as regarded field guns, and in this he could not agree. A perfectly dead flat for many hundred yards was most rare as a military feature in a field of action, the most trifling undulation or fold of ground would give a sufficient reverse slope to offer considerable protection to men and horses, and a commander of a battery would receive the censure of a general officer if he came into action where he had not such shelter. He therefore regretted that we had not breech-loaders for our field-service. With the present long range, the Artillery had a better chance of selecting their ground; it was generally possible for them to get some sort of cover for man and horse; and, in view of the importance of obtaining shelter, the breech-loader was as desirable in the field as it was in ships.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the broad question before the House was practically that of breech-loaders versus muzzle-loaders, and whether the responsibility of its decision should rest with the Government or with their professional advisers. He believed it should rest with the Government, which up to the present time had over-ruled its professional advisers. The Ordnance Select Committee were slightly adverse to breech-loaders for field artillery, and slightly inclined to them for heavy artillery, and in 1868 they sent a letter to the War Office recommending experiments with heavy guns; but the Government objected to go to the expense, and soon afterwards dissolved the Committee. The short endurance of our guns was an accident which it had been impossible to separate from our system, and the figures that were supposed to indicate the life of a gun were misleading, as the number of rounds recorded in these Returns were made up partly of so-called full charges, which were really less. The only charge which could be used in action was the battering charge—and it was not the full charges but the battering charges which affected the life of a gun. There were nominally full charges and reduced charges, but full charges were not used even in action, because they would require fresh machinery to check the recoil. He would certainly support the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain G. E. Price) if he went to a division; but the grand point to insist upon was that the Government was responsible, and nobody else, in that matter.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the expression of opinion on that important question in that House was very much a reflex of the state of opinion out-of-doors—that was to say, there existed a very great diversity of view among those who were entitled to form a judgment on the subject as to the comparative merits of breech-loading and muzzle-loading guns. As was natural, therefore, the advice offered to the Government had been of very different kinds. The hon. Gentleman who had introduced the question (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) proposed the re-appointment of the Ordnance Select Committee. His hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Captain G. E. Price), on the other hand, was not satisfied with a Committee of experts, but wished the House to appoint a Committee of its own Members to consider that subject. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) appeared at the beginning of his speech to think that the Government ought to be responsible in the matter; but at the conclusion of his remarks he seemed inclined to send the question to a Select Committee upstairs. He accepted the view taken by the hon. Member for Pembroke in his opening remarks, that the Government ought to be responsible in the matter. He therefore could not agree to the re-appointment of the Ordnance Select Committee, which would to a certain extent be relieving the Government of responsibility; neither could he assent to relegate that subject to a Committee of that House. The hon. Member (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) urged that the Ordnance Select Committee should be re-appointed, because when hon. Gentlemen were applied to

As was natural, therefore, the advice offered to the Government had been of very different kinds. The hon. He therefore could not agree to the re-appointment of the Ordnance Select Committee, which would to a certain extent be relieving the Government of responsibility; neither could he assent to relegate that subject to a Committee of that House. The hon. Member (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) urged that the Ordnance Select Committee should be re-appointed, because when hon. Gentlemen were applied to by inventors they could then tell them to go to that Committee. But that was hardly a sufficient reason for re-appointing that body. The House had heard how that Committee, after a time, ceasing to perform judicial functions, had taken upon themselves to be more or less of an experimental Committee, and, like all those engaged in experiments and inventions, they became more or less partizans. They should therefore profit by the lessons of experience; and after the history which had been given of that Committee the House would hardly be willing to recommend its re-appointment. Then as to the suggestion that they should refer the matter to a Committee of that House, although Select Committees were very useful on many subjects, it would scarcely be advisable to refer a question so technical as the present to such a body. It would, moreover, hardly be becoming to throw upon a Committee functions which ought to be discharged by the Government itself. Therefore, he hoped the House would not assent to either the original Motion or the Amendment. The debate had chiefly turned upon naval guns. With regard to the question as to rifling the guns and preparing the projectiles for the grooves, it was a very technical one, and he did not feel at all competent to enlarge upon it. But these matters had been considered by experts who had been called upon to advise Government with reference to them, and from what he had read of their opinions it appeared that they opposed very strongly the views advocated by his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain G. E. Price) behind him. Perhaps more generally interesting to the House was the question as to the respective merits of the breech-loading and the muzzle-loading guns. In regard to that subject it must be remarked that the case of the turret guns differed very much from that of the broadside guns. In connection with the former, allusion had been made to an invention which was now coming into practical use—the employment, namely, of hydraulic machinery in working the enlarged guns with which the turrets were provided. His hon. and gallant Friend (Captain G. E. Price) said that when experiments with that invention were made the other day on board the Hotspur, great defects were discovered. The information which had reached him (Mr. Hunt) was different. What had been said about the projectile not going home was, he believed, a mistake. It was a preliminary trial; a great deal of the machinery was not properly fixed, and consequently there were defects in the details of the arrangements; but they were of a kind which could be avoided in the future. He believed that those who witnessed the experiment were of opinion that it promised a great ultimate success. If that success should really be attained, he had no doubt it would put the muzzle-loading guns, as regarded rapidity of fire, pretty much on a par with the breech-loading guns. The hon. Member for Pembroke had asked why the hydraulic machinery could not be used for breech-loading guns as well as for muzzle-loading guns. No doubt, in the course of time, it would be made applicable to the breech-loaders; but as regarded the use of those guns in a turret, it was worth bearing in mind that there might be an objection on the ground of smoke which would come from them when the breech was removed. Even with a breech-loading fowling-piece hon. Members must have found, in certain conditions of the atmosphere, that it was sometimes difficult to get a second shot. That being so, it might be doubted whether the men in a turret would be able to breathe if breech-loading guns were used. As regarded the broadside guns, a superiority was attributed by many people to the breech-loaders on the ground of the rapidity of fire and the non-exposure of the men. As to the question of exposure, he could not see, after giving the best attention to it, that there was much difference. The real ground on which our gunnery authorities based their preference for the muzzle-loading guns was because of their greater strength and their greater simplicity, which would prevent their getting out of order in the heat of action, and so causing great loss of life through the breech not being properly closed. He admitted that, in the consideration of this question, there were pros and cons, advantages and disadvantages, to be taken into account, and he was by no means prepared to put his foot down upon it, and say that on no future occasion should the subject be re-opened; but, as far as he was able to judge, it appeared to him that no case had been made out for the substitution of the breech-loading for the muzzle-loading gun. They knew, however, that they had got a comparatively cheap gun, which cost three-and-a-half times less than the Krupp guns in use in Germany, and in which their seamen gunners had the fullest confidence. The success of the Prussians in the late war had been attributed, in a great measure, to their artillery; but it must not be assumed that their superiority in that arm was the sole cause of their being victorious. From all that Her Majesty's Government had been able to ascertain, the Krupp guns had never been put to the severe test that our service guns had been. A statement had been made that a large number of the Krupp guns had become unserviceable during the late war, and it was said in the other House that no less than 200 of them had burst. That assertion had, however, been contradicted by the agent in this country of Herr Krupp in a letter which appeared in The Times, in which it was declared that only 17 of those guns had burst. Since that letter had been published, however, it had been maintained by many persons that, although the guns had not all burst, at least 200 of them had become unserviceable during the war. Under these circumstances, it was rather difficult to arrive at a conclusion on the subject. It was, however, an important fact that Herr Krupp had refused to sell Her Majesty's Government one of his guns—whether from fear of the severity of the test to which it would be put or not he could not say—and hon. Members would, therefore, hesitate in such a case to decide off-hand that his guns were preferable to ours. The House, however, might rest satisfied that Her Majesty's Government would keep their eyes open to all new inventions in artillery, and would give every attention to the subject.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR observed, that before the Government adopted the breech-loading system instead of the present simple muzzle-loading system they must make up their minds to recommend to Parliament an expenditure of between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were present; House counted, and 40 und present, GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR concluded by repeating that this increase of expenditure made the proposed change a matter for serious consideration.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, that the House was now enduring Morning Sittings as well as late Evening Sittings. If they were to have Morning Sittings regularly, there must be some limit to the Evening Sittings, yet the House had been far more than three hours committed to a discussion which ended in the withdrawal both of the Motion and Amendment. He moved that the House do now adjourn.

[The Amendment, not being seconded, was not proposed.]

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS REPEAL

(Sir Harcourt Johnstone. Mr. Stansfeld.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: In bringing this subject before the House, I am aware that I am undertaking a very delicate and difficult task—difficult, because so many hon. Members who have formerly voted for the repeal of these Acts are unfortunately, now out of Parliament, and delicate because the subject has been so criticized and censured, and even, I may say, so ostracized by the Press and by many people in this country that it is scarcely possible to obtain a thorough ventilation of it without bringing it before the House of Commons. But the unwillingness I have felt in bringing it forward is not owing to any want of thorough conviction which has deepened and strengthened every day and every hour, that a Repeal Bill was absolutely necessary. Moreover, I have an intense dislike as many other hon. Members of that House to prominence on a matter which is so revolting, so loathsome. It has not been my habit to trouble the House on many questions during the last few years; but I felt bound, in deference to the wishes of many of my constituents, for whose judgment and whose feelings I have the greatest respect, and also in deference to the unanimously expressed wish of certain Members of the House who had met to consider the question, to come forward. I must remind the House that three Acts have been passed on this subject differing from each other very slightly, except that they have become more intensely despotic in character as they advanced. In 1864—according to the Report of the Royal Commission that sat on the subject—an Act was passed without notice in or out of Parliament, for the suppression of contagious diseases in various parts of the Kingdom, at certain places, the names of which it mentioned. After the Act of 1864, a medical Committee sat to report on the working of the Act, and in 1866 the Act of 1864, was repealed, and an amended or more stringent Act was passed. Subsequently, and after the Reports of the Lords' and Commons' Committees in 1868, an Act was passed in 1869—the third Act that had been passed on the subject. There were certain penalties in these Acts which at first were comparatively lenient, but as every successive Act was passed, those penalties became more and more stringent, and more dangerous to public liberty. By the Act of 1864, no proceedings were to be taken against a woman, unless there was sufficient evidence to satisfy the magistrates, and, after all, this was only such evidence as was founded on "reason to believe." That was a peculiar sort of evidence, but a mark of the more lenient character of that Act was, that no woman was to be detained for more than three months after she had been examined, and the imprisonment for rebellion against these provisions was for two months, and without hard labour. By the Act of 1866, the powers delegated to a superintendent of police or a medical man, were handed over to an inspector, thus giving them to a person of lower and less responsible position. By Section 16 of the Act of 1866, in case of their non-appearance, women were ordered to be examined constantly for a year, and the celebrated "Section 17," which I have no doubt will be the subject of much discussion, is embodied in that Act. It is the voluntary submission clause, and it provides that any woman in any place to which the Act applies may voluntarily, by a submission in writing, signed by her in the presence of, and attested by, a superintendent, submit herself for one year. I may here point out that the penalties under the Act of 1866 were these—A woman might be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour, for infringing the provisions of the Act, and for illegally quitting the hospital to which she was sent, she might be taken into custody without warrant; the limit of the operation of the Act being five miles from the station. In the Act of 1869, by Section 4, a woman escaping from hospital was liable, if found within a 10 miles limit, to be apprehended and put under the provisions of the Act; and what was worse than that was, that by Section 6 of the same Act, a voluntary submission was held to have the same effect as an order of the justices, while there were increased penalties for non-appearance, the duration being extended to nine months. I wish to point out how the severity of these Acts has been increased. In the Act of 1864, it was provided, first, that there must be an information before one or more justices; in 1866 there was what was termed the alternative of voluntary submission, and in 1869 voluntary submission was allowed to have the same effect as a justice's order. Thus every safeguard for the liberty of the subject has been gradually removed. I have no doubt that this was done with the best intentions, as is very often the case in these attempts to limit the freedom which every subject ought naturally to enjoy, in order to secure the object of those who pass restrictive laws, and so far as intentions go, I do not blame them. They made no secret of the fact that they desired to make the Acts as stringent and powerful for the purpose they had in view, as was possible, and therefore they had very naturally pressed for increased stringency and severity. But it so happened that in 1866 there were very few people who began to see what these Acts were likely to do, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) said during the discussion on the subject in that year that the measure was "a very queer Bill on a very queer subject," and he recommended reclamation. Well, I do not wish to pin myself to reclamation, at least, so far as State-reclamation is concerned. Voluntary reclamation is one thing, and State-reclamation is another. Mr. Ayrton, who was then in the House, too, characterized the Bill as one for—

"Keeping public women at the public expense for the gratification of soldiers and sailors. No useful or moral end was intended, the end in view being vice, unmitigated vice," and he added that "such a proposal was a disgrace to the country."—[3 Hansard, clxxxii. 815.]

That Bill was brought into the House at 1 o'clock in the morning. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) at that time Chancellor of the Exchequer, said—

"That it was hardly possible the subject could be discussed then with that fulness which would be desirable."—[Ibid. 816.]

The Bill was recommitted on the 26th of April at nearly 2 o'clock in the morning. Lord Clarence Paget protested, in answer to some remarks made, against the idea of women being certificated by the Acts, and Mr. Henley asked why the Bill was not to be generally applied—if to Windsor, why not to Westminster? In the Act of 1866, owing to remonstrances of certain hon. Members, it was provided that moral and religious instruction was to be given to the women in the hospitals. I will now analyse, but not at any great length, some of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, because the Royal Commission have been so inconsistent in those recommendations that their Report is really, in certain respects, a perfect farce. There can be no doubt that in the case of a numerous Commission, on which there are men holding different views, the recommendations contained in the various paragraphs of the Report most naturally display a good deal of diversity. There is, undoubtedly, a distinct antagonism in the views of the different Members of a Royal Commission, and that antagonism is clearly marked in many passages of their Report in a very peculiar manner. The Report, at the same time, contains some remarkable admissions, to which I would call the attention of the House. It is admitted that the "Act of 1866 sought to render the practice of prostitution, if not innocuous, at least much less dangerous;" and that, at all events, affords a very significant explanation of the true purpose of the Act. Paragraph 14 of the Report contradicts the statement of the Lords' Committee that the diminution of disease at Devonport was owing to the recent laws, because the Act of 1866 had not been in force when the Report was made. Another paragraph relates how curiously evidence was procured from soldiers who were drunk, and who often wanted to shield the persons with whom they had consorted; as well as from brothel-house keepers, who were in constant communication with, and who were, in fact, the allies of the police. Paragraph 23 says the charges made against the police cannot be substantiated, a statement which I venture entirely to deny. There is a Member of the Royal Commission, not now present, but who will probably be in his place in the course of the afternoon, who may have occasion to point out that the evidence of some of these women had been proffered to the Commission, but that it had been refused; while the mere ipse dixit of those who were engaged in the administration of the Acts, was taken as a denial of the charges made by the women, who, however, were not brought before the Commission. I maintain that there are many well-authenticated cases that can be sustained; but there is one very recent instance of the injustice and cruelty that was perpetrated under these Acts. I need not allude at any great length to the case of Mrs. Percy, at Aldershot; but there can be no doubt whatever that—even if that woman had been a habitually drunken woman, or even a woman consorting with soldiers, as persons in her class of life might do without being prostitutes—the hardship she was made to suffer was such as to induce her to destroy her own life. If she had been a confirmed prostitute, she would not have been in such a state of complete and abject want as she was proved to have been in, previous to her death; and if every woman is to be called a prostitute, because on one occasion she is seen by the police to be drinking—inferences may be drawn which can only be equalled by the inference drawn in the case of the Cambridge carrier, who, when asked whether his horse could draw inferences, replied—“My horse can draw anything in reason.” The difference here is that the inferences drawn by the police, in Mrs. Percy's case, were entirely without reason; they had drawn inferences to suit their own purposes. The following admission of the Royal Commissioners is a very remarkable one. In Paragraph 37, it is stated that—

“There was no ground for the assertion that any diminution of the disease in the Army and Navy was attributable to a diminution of disease contingent on a periodical examination of women.”

That being so, why has Parliament taken action in the matter? I do not wish to blame the present Government, or any other Government, for the question is one that is far above Party considerations, and I do not propose to enter into any contest of political antagonism upon it. The Bill before the House is supported by hon. Members on both sides, and I am unwilling that the discussion of it should assume a Party tone. Moreover, I assert that those who support the Bill do not wish it to be supposed that they regard themselves as standing upon any lofty pinnacle of morality. It is not upon such grounds that they desire to proceed. For I admit that quite as good men are in favour of the Acts, as are against them. What I and my Friends hold is that there has been a misapprehension on the subject; that people have relied entirely on the Government statistics, and have not taken the trouble to dive into the nature of these Act, and I am not surprised at it. I admit that for many a long day I refused to look into the Acts, but I at length had to do it, long before the General Election, and the more I looked into the question, the less argument I found in their favour, and the more sure I felt that it was undesirable to maintain the Acts, either for the good of soldiers, sailors, or civilians, or for the morality of the country. Immediately after Paragraph 37 of the Report of the Commission, which states that there is no evidence of a diminution of disease, it is stated that there is a “general impression” that these Acts have acted beneficially on the health of the men. In Paragraph 48 the Commissioners contradict their first view by saying that frequent examination is a most efficacious means of controlling disease. Can anything show more thoroughly how inconsistent that Report is? We know what this is owing to; but those who read the Report will no longer have reason to doubt, looking at the evidence it is founded upon, that these Acts were unnecessary. Another extraordinary admission made by the Commissioners is that—“It is difficult to escape from the inference that the State, in passing these Acts, has assumed prostitution to be a necessity.” That is, in fact, the line that has been taken in foreign countries; many of whom have assumed that prostitution is a necessity. In my opinion, such is not the view of the majority of the people of this country. It may be the view of certain military men, and also of a certain number of those connected with the Navy. And that view is not confined to them, for it is held by a great many people belonging to the civil community; but it will be utterly subversive of the morality of the country if it should be generally admitted. Among the recommendations at the end of the Report are—that the system of periodical examinations should be discontinued; that the police, in carrying the Acts into force, should perform their duties in uniform; and that the Acts should be extended to any place in the United Kingdom from which a request is made for their application, except London and Westminster. I have not heard that any places have availed themselves of the suggestion which has been given. It is true that there is one place that has memorialized the Home Secretary to extend these Acts to that locality. It is a town in the Isle of Wight, and the memorial is the consequence of a report that a large number of prostitutes from Portsmouth has gone thither for refuge from the action of the police. But the prayer of the memorial is entirely contradicted by the town council, and no action has been taken upon it. Now, there are three distinct principles on which the supporters of this Bill proceed. They hold, in the first place, that it is not the business of the State to provide the means of self-indulgence for the Army, the Navy, or any other class of society in this country or elsewhere; secondly, that it is not the business of the State to connive at the maintenance of houses of ill-fame, but to suppress them, and that, not by a central agency, but by means of the local authorities; and the third great principle they maintain is this—that, so long as they are in this House, they should endeavour to see that no Act of Parliament should be passed that will allow any office or Department, whether the Home Office or any other, to frame and carry out regulations that are inconsistent with the liberty of the people, and with constitutional law. A very active and zealous gentleman in the Home Office (Captain Harris) has issued a Report, which I have no doubt the Home Secretary will thoroughly endorse. I do not blame any man for doing that, and the gentleman referred to has done his duty thoroughly and completely, but many of the statements in his Report are such as the House ought carefully to attend to. It is a most curious Report, and so far as the intention of the writer and compiler is concerned, it is no doubt excellent. It deals with a great many statistics, into which I will not enter, as that part of the question will be handled far better than I can handle it by an hon. Member who has made himself thoroughly acquainted with the figures. There is, however, one statement that is apt to mislead many people and I will therefore call attention to it. The 4th section of the Home Office Report states that in towns where the Acts are enforced, the voice of the general public is strongly in their favour, and that the opposition comes from persons who are ignorant of the law, or who reside in places distant from the scene of its operation. Now, the question is, has the voice of the public been tested on this subject? Has there been any discussion out-of-doors before the Acts were passed? That is the point. I assert that in every district in England in which meetings have since been held—where the meetings have not been packed—the voice of the general public is not in favour of the Acts. ["Oh, oh!"] Only recently at public, and not packed meetings, that have been held at Portsmouth and Chatham on the subject, the majority of those present strongly protested by their speeches and votes against these Acts. No doubt there are a good many in those towns who say they believe the health of their sons and daughters and of their friends may possibly be preserved and not endangered by the operation of the Acts, and that there is greater quietude and respectability of demeanour among the prostitutes who are much better conducted than before. It is also said that respectable people have been known to say they would gladly pay a special rate for the maintenance of the Acts, so much have they contributed to the peace and quietude of the places in which they lived. They do not add, however, that they contribute to the morality of the towns in which they are enforced, and I am of opinion that that is a great omission, and that morality ought to be substituted for "quietude." The Report I have referred to, says that wherever a chance exists of the reclamation of women, every effort has been made to reclaim them before they are brought under the operation of the Acts. There is no doubt that the policemen who are entrusted with the duty of enforcing the law, are all human beings—fathers, brothers and sons—and perhaps they have no wish to see young creatures hurried prematurely into a life of prostitution. I have no doubt that the metropolitan and the local police may also have done something to caution the young women they go amongst against coming under the law. I will not weary the House by going into statistics as to the number of persons who have been reclaimed, nor the statement as to the decrease of brothels—which was, in fact, due to another law—nor to the alleged large diminution of prostitutes in Devonport; but I think if we see to what these figures amount, we cannot attach very much importance to them. One thing that I would point out is, that the limits in which the Acts operate, have been enlarged by the “amended” law; but, in point of fact, the enlarged limits are not used in all cases by the police. I am told that at Windsor, where the Acts are enforced, the police do not find themselves able to control the action of the prostitutes to the full extent of the legal area, and the women simply go off to Datchet and to other places, almost under the walls of the Castle. The truth of the matter is, that you cannot keep up a machinery that will thus control the action of human beings. The whole tendency of this peculiar trade, and of those who are engaged in it, is to evade the police, and I hold that it can never conduce to the real morality of the country, to keep up a body of police to watch the public morals. There is no doubt that the public require protection in many ways; but I do not think they require to be protected in the manner the Home Office and the authorities of the Army and Navy imagine. It is said in a well-known work by Carlyle, written nearly 50 years ago—

“It were but blindness to deny that this superior morality is, properly, rather an inferior criminality, produced not by greater love of virtue, but by greater perfection of police.”

Again—

“It is by tangible material considerations we are guided, not by inward and spiritual.” You cannot tell in the case of soldiers whether the men are married or not. It was the case when I was in the Army that a certain proportion of the men were married and a certain proportion were single, and I am told that in the case of one of the towns which is under the protection of the Act, a colonel commanding a regiment came before a Committee of this House, and stated that not only did he object, but that the married men and the “good conduct” men under him objected entirely to these Acts. Many of those who were, or would be, married, were kept down by the constant system of espionage and police vigilance which no doubt seem quite right to the promoters of these Acts, but which are certainly not conducive to the liberty of the subject.

Sir Harcourt Johnstone

There is no doubt that whenever a regiment removes to fresh quarters there is a new importation of those who follow the fortunes of the Army. In that case the old comers in the town meet the new comers, and the former, finding that their original monopoly is interfered with, inform the police of the doings of the latter, and these Acts are sustained by such methods. What can be thought of a system which is kept up by the information of prostitutes and sometimes of drunken soldiers, although it may happen that information is sometimes obtained from the respectable inhabitants of the place? Some of these women remain, some, perhaps, from disposition or idleness, but others, again, from fear, for having got once into the clutches of the police they cannot escape, while others may remain from attachment to the men with whom they have consorted, even though they are not married. There can be no doubt, as everyone can judge from the experience of former generations, that the sort of terrorism produced by these Acts leads to evasion. The hon. Baronet having referred to the failure of every attempt to enforce severe restrictive laws on this subject, during the reigns of Constantine, Louis XIV. in Spain and in Prussia, and the admission of eminent French physicians that all attempts to diminish the evil had totally failed, continued—Dr. Drysdale, a countryman of our own, the senior physician of the Metropolitan Free Hospital, says—

“On going over the Paris hospitals I am driven to the conclusion that there is more disease in Paris than in London, Paris having only half our population, and this, too, after 80 years trial of the Contagious Diseases Acts.”

He, moreover, challenges contradiction of this fact, and neither Dr. Ricord nor any other of the celebrated French writers have dared to deny it. I may say, however, that this fact was partly insisted on, and partly denied by the Royal Commission. And here let me ask, to whom do you apply the examination that takes place under these Acts? You apply it to a large class of women, many of whom are not prostitutes, and who have never been prostitutes, and even who have never been diseased; and you apply it to one sex alone. You apply it only to women. I had the good fortune while in the Army to serve with Lord Herbert during the last few months of his life, and I remember his speaking very highly of the efforts of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief to redeem the position of the Army; but I do not think it would ever have entered into Lord Herbert's head to recommend for our adoption such Acts as are now on the Statute Book. In point of fact, his Commission recommended the discontinuance of the examination even of the men, because it was so degrading to them. The men hated it; the doctors hated it; and it was regarded as utterly repulsive to all natural feeling. I know that many of the commanding officers, and many of the surgeons in the Army hate the present system; and I am told that certain surgeons who expressed their abhorrence of it were told that their promotion depended entirely on their compliance with the Acts. I have been told that by a commander serving in the Army in London at this moment, and also by a colonel commanding a battalion of the Guards. There is a pecuniary fine levied upon the soldiers who contract this disease, and those who draw up the statistics on this subject can tell us how it operates. It leads to concealment. You first forbid the soldier to marry, and then you fine him—for what? Not for the self-indulgence of which he has been guilty, but because he has been unfortunate enough to contract disease. I know it may, and probably will be said that the disease interferes with the man's efficiency, and this, no doubt, is true; but, the morality of the argument is peculiar. Putting it to a lower test, it is as if you should say—"It is very desirable to steal; you have only to take care that you are not found out." That really is the morality of this system. There is no doubt that this system was adopted by Lord Cardwell with the very best intentions. I am sure he would be the last man knowingly to do an immoral thing, and it was no doubt intended to promote the efficiency of the Army, but now that it has been tried and found wanting, I cannot think that the officers of the Army will desire its continuance. But I ask, what statesman in this House will get up in his place and venture to say—"Apply these Acts to both sexes of human beings?" I maintain that this House would not pass an Act that would compel a registration of men, and keep them on the register for a year—an Act that would arrest men coming out of brothels and require from them a voluntary submission, the refusal to sign which would render them liable to punishment. You would find it impossible to apply these Acts to both sexes, and therefore I say that in common justice and equity they ought to be repealed. If you desire to extend these Acts to both sexes, let us have a measure brought before the House for that purpose. Well, how do these Acts affect the morals of the people? I am told that those women who have not become hardened to the system of examination are to be seen drunk in the streets, and going about in that state through towns in which they live. They are sometimes accompanied by men; and even in the very face of your new elementary schools, where you have enacted that religious instruction shall form part of the education given to the children, these women are to be thus seen, for the benefit of the rising generation; and, moreover, the rising population have been seen taking an interest in seeing these poor creatures going to the examination. I find also from the statements of men who are living in these protected districts, and who can vouch for these facts, that in Southampton, the public rush to the room where the prostitutes sit, and young boys may be seen looking at and talking to them. Fancy seeing a number of people watching a batch of prostitutes thrust into one place, some of them half drunk, some perfectly brazen-faced, and a crowd of young boys, looking at and laughing at them! Well, Sir, I cannot think that these things can be at all conducive to morality. It has been said that if the certificates are no longer given to these women they can no longer go round with them and say—"I am a Queen's woman: I am at liberty to follow this trade!" The certificate is now retained; but the moment a woman has been examined and liberated, it is just as well known that she has been discharged as fit for the public service. We are told that it is not our business to interfere, and that the authorities of the Army and Navy are responsible to this House for the efficiency of the public service. I ask, however, are we to accept these illegalities as legal? We are not in a state of siege and under martial law; and I do not think the House of Commons will ever abdicate its right to deal with those Services, or to prevent them having absolute power over the persons of civilians. Sir, the accusation has been levelled against us that we are indifferent to the health of the country; that we wish to promote these diseases; that we will not believe the good these Acts have done, and that we are desirous of spreading disease as much as possible. For my own part, I cannot feel that I ought to plead guilty to this charge. Personally, for many years, I have taken a very active part in urging on the local authorities, in my district, the necessity of establishing sanatoria for the prevention of contagious disease—not of this character, but of another. I have said that I have taken a very active part in this work, and if it is said that we do not care for the Army and its reputation, I reply that the honour, reputation, and efficiency of the Army, are as dear to me as they are to any hon. Gentleman opposite, including my hon. and gallant Friend who is to move the rejection of this Bill (Colonel Alexander). My hon. and gallant Friend is going to move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months, or six months, whichever it may be. I am sure that, whatever he does, will be done as everything he does is always done, bond fide, and in the most straightforward manner; but, having known him for 30 years, and knowing that he has spent the larger portion of his life in the Army, I may say that although, perhaps I may not be imbued with the military ideas he entertains, I have the advantage over him with regard to civilian views, which, in this House, are almost the only views upon which we act. There has been a good deal said about the position which women have taken in this matter, and upon this point I will say, that in common justice, at least, when we hear of women being attacked for meddling with these Acts, we are bound to admit that if women had not begun to interfere for the liberties of their own sex, however low or degraded they might be, the men would never have taken up the subject at all. The fact is, that many of us have neglected our duty in this matter, and so far from the women being blamed, they are to be greatly praised; while the scurrilous remarks that have been made about them are only disgraceful to those who have made them. Some women have taken up this subject, whose spotless reputations and great abilities are quite sufficient answer to those cynical gentlemen who believe in nothing but their own philosophical materialism. Amongst them are ladies who have been highly nurtured and highly educated, and who have had much more reluctance in touching this subject than any of us, and if, under these circumstances, they have come forward to do their duty to their country-women, I do not think that we should censure them. Turning to another point, I may say that amongst the remedies that have been employed for increasing the efficiency of the Army, the House should remember the measures of a sanitary nature that have been adopted with such good results for a good many years. Within my recollection there was a most disgusting want of facilities for cleanliness and sanitary purposes in the Army, such as would not have been tolerated in any other civilized country. Why, there used to be nothing for the men to wash in except the urine tub, which stood in the front of the road. Now, however, all these things have been improved. Every facility has been given to the soldier for improving his condition, by the establishment of libraries, &c., and better arrangements for cleanliness. These things, I contend, really have had a great deal to do with the improved health of the Army. I now come to the question of reclamation. Many people hold by the idea that these Acts are doing a great moral work. ["Hear, hear!"] I think my hon. Friend opposite believes this thoroughly. He is fully persuaded that these Acts are doing a great deal of good, and, of course, as he belongs to the Home Office, he would naturally back up its officials. [Sir HENRY SELWYN-IBBETSON said, it was not from him that the cheer came.] I did not impute to the hon. Baronet that he is capable of holding that view. But there are those who say that these Acts have a reclaiming effect; that the streets are quieter since they have been in operation, and that numbers of women have been reformed. If so, the figures which show the results are very scarce; and, for my part, I believe that where these reclamations are said to have taken place in consequence of these Acts, there has been nothing but hypocrisy. No doubt, opportunities are afforded to the metropolitan police of finding out and reclaiming women; but they do not try to reclaim them. They may put out their hands—and they are quite right in so doing—to warn them off the streets, and they may recommend them to go back to their families; but when I hear of these wholesale reclamations, I say that there are no powers in the Acts providing for the reclamation of these people. The only means of doing this are those which certain Rescue Societies provide. It is said that the class of women thus said to be reclaimed are the better for having been under the operation of these Acts. If, however, they were to be summoned to a Committee-room of this House, it would be seen that this was not the case, and the Committee would arrive at an opposite opinion. The very fact of their having been on the register has rendered it almost impossible to reform them. There are homes which have been provided for them both before and after the passing of these Acts, but they are provided by voluntary subscriptions. This is so at Portsmouth. There was, I believe, a power of sending women to these homes, and I really do not know whether the expense of sending them there appears in the Estimates. It cannot be denied, I think, that one result of the examination of those unhappy women is, that they become more and more hardened, and therefore less and less susceptible of good impressions. They may be improved in appearance and become more prosperous, but they are more hardened, so that prostitution cannot be lessened by the periodical examination. I will not go to other statistics, but will take those of foreign countries. The Prefects of Paris and of the Hague state that clandestine prostitution is constantly on the increase. The physician of the first hospital in Austria states that there is in his district no diminution of prostitution whatsoever. In Paris clandestine prostitution is spreading. Mr. Wolferstan, the house surgeon at Devonport, stated in his evidence before the Royal Commission that he was entirely opposed to the present Acts, because they failed to effect any improvement in the health of the soldiers and sailors, while they greatly increased clandestine prostitution. What does the matron of

She says that the moral is remarkably small

—that one in four may be doing well; while the matron at Devonport says that the Acts do little permanent restoration. The chaplain says that—

“Advice does little, because it is of a compulsory character; in fact, these women know just as well as we do that they are not imprisoned from motives of kindness, but to give security to men: and you cannot effect your purpose by these Acts, which by attempting on the one hand to remove the consequences, on the other hand directly stimulate the cause.”

You may cover it with the cloak of a spurious morality or with a coating of State varnish; you may make it more specious, but you cannot make it more moral or more worthy of the consideration of the people of England—and who, I would ask, are in favour of those Acts? They are opposed to the feelings of the great religious bodies of the country. You may perhaps say that they are fanatical. Well, that will come with ill-grace from the hon. Gentlemen opposite who have fought for religious education. Sir, I have presented numbers of Petitions from English clergymen in the five northern dioceses, numerous signed. I do not say that they were all against those Acts, but I do say that many of them were, and that they manifest a growing feeling against the Acts. I will take Cardinal Manning, I will take the leading Baptists, hundreds of Congregational ministers, almost the whole of the Wesleyan body, the Society of Friends, the bulk of the Scotch Churches, the United Presbyterians, and the Scotch Free Church, and other bodies for whom Petitions were presented to-day by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), who stated that they represented the great bulk of religious feeling in Scotland. I do not know what the mind of all my hon. Friends at this side of the House may be; but as far as I can judge, Roman Catholic Members cannot be favourable to Acts of the kind. And, moreover, the feeling against them is not confined to the country. To my knowledge there is a very widespread feeling against them over the whole of Europe. The evidence on this point goes to show, beyond doubt, that public opinion in the great towns and cities of the Continent—where there is public opinion—is decidedly against such laws. That feeling exists strongly in Italy and Switzerland. Only yesterday I read a letter from a former President of the Federal Chamber, in which he says that public opinion must come round by degrees against such Acts, for that to legalize prostitution is repulsive to the feelings of the people. Well, then, the question is—What is to be done? What do our opponents propose to do? I say this boldly, that I consider it to be the duty of the State, in all those districts where the course of circumstances brings together a large body of men, under peculiar circumstances, there it is the duty of the State to contribute to the hospitals. I am not going to say that because the disease is caused by immorality, therefore it ought not to be cured. That would be repugnant to common sense; and I say that wherever the peculiar circumstances to which I have referred exist, Lock wards ought to be attached to the hospitals. I do not know where you could get local authorities to do so; but if it came before me as Chairman of a Board of Guardians, or local sanitary authority, I would urge the matter upon them. I would say you must not shut your eyes to the fact that this disease exists; try to improve the condition of those who are subject to it, by laying before them the highest lessons of morality, but do not shut your eyes to the fact that the evil exists, and where it exists make provision for the lessening of it. And, moreover, there is voluntary effort to be made available, which exists in all the Churches, and which is never called upon in vain for any great or philanthropic cause. Look at the range after range of hospitals which it supports, and has for 40 or 50 years supported in London. Funds they often want, but the want is speedily supplied, and now we have the special effort put forth on Hospital Sunday on their behalf. In voluntary effort you will find an enormous reserve of philanthropic charity, and that not only for cure but for reclamation and prevention also. I know that not very far from me there resides one person who has given up almost every luxury of life for the sake of reclaiming and maintaining those poor women. And I know many persons who have deprived themselves of a great deal, and made many sacrifices in the same excellent cause. Societies of such persons are increasing in every town and city in the country, and, in some respects, I do not lament that those Acts have been passed, because their ineffi-cacy has been shown; and it has been demonstrated that the work of reclamation and cure—the work of improving the morals of the people—really must be done through the medium of voluntary effort. Sir, those Acts must be repealed. I do not care how many may vote with us to-day. That is, I had almost said, a matter of indifference to me. This movement is only beginning. We will go on with it. We have made up our minds to do so. We have not only advocates on this side of the House with us, but we have good advocates with us on the other side also. I say that those Acts must be repealed, because they are injurious to private liberty and public morality, and repulsive alike to Christianity and civilization. I beg, Sir, to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
“That the Bill be now read the second time.”—(Sir Harcourt Johnstone.)

COLONEL ALEXANDER: If I cannot hope to imitate my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone) in the clearness and perspicuity of his language, I will at least endeavour to follow his moderation. It is frequently said of questions debated in this House that they are not Party questions, but this is pre-eminently the case with the important subject which we are invited to consider to-day. The Acts of which my hon. Friend proposes the repeal were passed with the assent, if not the approbation, of both Parties in the State, and therefore whatever either of praise or blame attaches to this legislation, both Parties must share in an equal degree. I therefore respectfully invite hon. Gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House to consider in all its bearings this momentous question, and to reflect that the vote they give to-day may involve the happiness or misery, not only of the present, but of generations yet unborn. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough that reciprocating the spirit in which he has spoken, not one word shall fall from me reflecting on the character or motives of those who feel it their duty to advocate the repeal of these Acts. How could I, indeed, impugn the motives of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen whose names are on the back of this Bill, who are among the most respected and honoured Members of this House? And, Sir,

having read the evidence taken before the Royal Commission on which were associated three distinguished Members of this House, I desire to record my opinion that those witnesses who bore testimony adversely to these Acts, could not do otherwise than protest against their continuance. If, Sir, I might be allowed to single out one of these witnesses whose character and conduct entitle her to the highest admiration, it would be Mrs. Butler. Till I read, Sir, the evidence taken before the Commission I had formed no conception of the nobility of this lady's character. For 15 years prior to the passing of these Acts, she and her husband had received into their house at Liverpool poor outcast women as friends. She had taken them in as patients when ill, keeping them in her house till they died. "Our house," she says, "is a small refuge for them—sometimes five of them living together." If we had more women of this stamp, perhaps these Acts might not be so necessary as I humbly conceive them to be. When I say necessary, I do not pretend to defend all the details of the Acts, some of which are doubtless capable of amendment in the direction pointed out by the Royal Commission; but I do hope to make good their principle against the objections advanced by my hon. Friend. First of all, the hon. Baronet and those who think with him assert that the Acts legalize, sanction, and, in fact, recognize the necessity of prostitution. Sir, if I thought that such was their effect, I would not utter one syllable in their defence, but would use my utmost endeavour to sweep them from the Statute Book. But my hon. Friend, as I conceive, misinterprets these Acts and their effect. What was the position of prostitution in this country before this legislation was enforced? Hon. and learned Gentlemen will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that prostitution per se, although, perhaps, theoretically, was practically not an offence. If, however, the prostitute behaved in the streets in a riotous and indecent manner she brought herself within the provisions of the Vagrant Act, and the Police Clauses Acts in towns further authorized the punishment of those women who solicited passers by so as to cause annoyance. Thus far it may be said that the State recognized the existence of prostitution not as a necessity, but as a painful fact. It said to those unhappy women—"We know what you are—we are aware of your occupation, but we will not disturb you so long as you behave decorously and do not annoy passengers with solicitation." Prostitution was, in fact, regulated, although not legalized or sanctioned. Now, my hon. Friend will not, I think, deny that the principle of regulation being conceded, the State if it thought necessary might add to and supplement the regulations already in force. The State, then, finding an evil existing in our garrison towns and seaports, compared with which the annoyance caused by riotous behaviour and solicitation was petty and unimportant, said to the prostitute—"We do not recognize you more than before, but we must place you under further regulations; and if you insist on carrying on your immoral occupation we must take care that you do not communicate horrible disease to our soldiers and sailors. To do this effectually we consider periodical examination necessary, and if you should be found diseased detention in hospital. During that detention you will not be subjected to undue restraint. Chaplains, medical officers, and matrons will minister to your spiritual and temporal necessities. You will be brought under the influence of humanizing agencies, and if disposed to reform you will be placed in situations or restored to your friends." Will my hon. Friend tell me in what way these regulations recognize prostitution more than it was recognized before? Mrs. Lewis says she objects to the Acts because her Bible says "Make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof;" but let me ask Mrs. Lewis and her friends whether the State does make any such provision? On the contrary, it unfortunately finds the provision already existing and seeks by regulation to render it as innocuous as possible. But it may be said, indeed has been said, especially by Mr. William Fowler, formerly a Member of this House, and who moved the repeal of these Acts in 1873—Why are these Acts restricted to garrison towns, camps, and seaports? My answer is, the State may be said to stand in loco parentis to our soldiers and sailors, and when it locates simple country recruits in camps, where the disease is rife, is bound to protect them against its horrible ravages. Mrs. Butler says—"This legislation is abhorred by the country as a tyranny of the upper classes against the lower; but, to my mind, when you take measures to protect a simple country lad who often falls into temptation when under the influence of drink, you are legislating rather in favour of the poor than of the rich. Again, Sir, it is urged that in subjecting women to compulsory examination and detention you are violating the principle of personal liberty. The Rev. Mr. Kells, a Baptist minister, said—

"He considered the privileges of the British Constitution violated, and Magna Charta in abeyance, for women by the compulsory examination under the Acts."

And Mr. Cooper, Secretary to the Rescue Society, who is now engaged in active agitation against the Acts, testified before the Commission—

"That it was an unjustifiable invasion of a woman's liberty to bring her forcibly to hospital and detain her till cured."

But let me remind these gentlemen and others, that if this is a violation of Magna Charta similar violations of it are taking place daily and hourly. No person ill with small-pox would be allowed to leave a hospital uncured, and there is a clause moreover in the later Poor Law Acts enabling guardians to detain paupers in workhouses when labouring under contagious diseases. I now come, Sir, to a very important objection urged against the Acts—namely, that the compulsory examination and its attendant circumstances further degrade and harden these unhappy women. I will not dwell on the charges of cruelty brought against the medical officers when conducting the examination, because the Commission, I think, expressed itself satisfied that these charges had been completely disproved, and that a nurse was invariably present in the room. With respect to the degradation or supposed degradation involved in the examination itself, some conflicting evidence was given before the Commission. Miss Lucy Bull, the Matron of the Royal Albert Hospital, rightly described by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) as a most important witness against the Acts, "considers the periodical examination demoralizing and objectionable;" but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the witness parts company with him at that point, because she would revert to the examination prescribed by the Act of 1864, which he and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple) rightly think infinitely more objectionable than that legalized by the Act of 1866. Mrs. Kells, a most respectable witness, the wife of the minister from whose evidence I have already quoted, stated—

"The girls had told her that the examination was taking all modesty and self-respect out of them; that they never knew what indecency was till they submitted to this examination."

A statement which one of the Commissioners naturally followed up with the question—

"Are you not aware that in following up this vicious life, these women are in the habit of submitting themselves to three, four, and five men in an evening? Do you, as a woman, think that a fellow-woman who lives by doing this can talk of anything else having driven modesty out of her?"

To which the answer was—"Yes, they have their own conventional ideas." On the other hand, we have evidence to prove that what the women dislike is not the examination, but the detention in hospital if found diseased; and Dr. Barr, the visiting surgeon at Aldershot, says the only objections made by women were such as the following—"Well, Sir, my clothes were not quite dry, and I could not get my clothes perfectly clean, and I do not like to come up without." Nevertheless, Sir, I am quite willing to admit that there is "in the lowest depths a lower still," and I concur with that excellent woman, Miss Farrow, Superintendent of the Lock department at Portsmouth, and formerly seven years Matron of the Bristol Home, who thinks the periodical examination "a great blessing, having seen the want of it at Bristol." I concur with her in opinion, when she says—

"I never met a woman but that I found there was some good in her not quite gone; I never met a woman of whom I could say she could not be made lower."

Well, Sir, I say it is judicious, is it kind, to encourage such a woman in the notion that she is degraded by examination? Is it not rather the part of true friendship to point out to her that she is defiled and degraded—not by examination—but by the sin which entails the necessity of examination? Moreover, as Lord Hampton and six other dissentient Commissioners observe—

Colonel Alexander

"It is in the power of any woman to emancipate herself from examination, by resolving to abandon her vicious ways."

With regard to the circumstances attending the examination, I think it was proved that in one or two places—as, for instance, at Portsmouth—it was held at an inconvenient place and hour; that is, however, a matter of detail, which can easily be rectified; but when the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) talks as he did, two years ago, of women being driven up to the examination room by men, he forgets that a very competent witness on his own side entirely contradicts the assertion. Mrs. Kells told the Commission—

"For two or three months I attended every day, from the beginning to the close of the examination, in a shed constructed for that purpose. I received girls who chose to come and speak to me. I never, except on one occasion, saw a man accompanying a girl."

But, Sir, would it be possible to dispense with the examination without neutralizing the advantages contemplated by the Acts? Many of the most competent medical witnesses depose that examination is the essential feature of the Acts. Mr. Lane, the Senior Surgeon of the Lock Hospital, in London, who has been connected with it since 1846, in reply to a question whether compulsory detention in hospital would not be sufficient without compulsory examination, replied—

"I think it would be very unfortunate for the women to deprive them of the advantages of the examination, that their diseases may be discovered at the earliest possible time," and added, "If I thought compulsion unjustifiable, I should object to it quite as much at one end as at the other," and further, "It appears to be trifling with the evil to close one end and leave the other open."

Before leaving this part of the subject, I may say that I am in favour of the examination, at stated intervals, of soldiers and sailors—in fact, such examination has always been carried out in the regiment to which I have the honour to belong. With regard to the suggested examination of men in civil life, Mr. Lane gives a decided opinion that it would be both impossible and impracticable. The fact is, there is no corresponding class among men—at least, I hope not. Only one witness before the Royal Commission hinted that there was. If there is, all I can say is, let such men be sent not to be examined, but to penal servitude. Mrs. Butler, indeed, tells us she had heard that the solicitation by men in Glasgow was fearful, but she fortunately explains her meaning by saying that she was herself, on one occasion, so solicited in that city. Well, she might, I imagine, have given her assailant into custody, and no special enactment is therefore necessary to meet that case. Mr. Thomas, the Secretary of the London Female Preventive Institution, whose name is appended to the Papers denying the correctness of Captain Harris's statistics, would have every man examined

"Who walks with more than one woman, and that every man who cannot prove that he does not go with any woman other than his own wife should be placed under surveillance;"

but he scarcely appears to see that for such a law to be equal it must be made applicable to many women beyond the limited class who live on the wages of sin. Another important objection urged against the Acts is, that by making the women more attractive and safe you increase immorality among men; but it is alleged by more than one witness—and my own knowledge of soldiers enables me to confirm the allegation—that they are, as a rule, very unlikely to make such nice calculations. Admitting, however, the existence of some isolated cases, are they not more than counterbalanced by the improvement which takes place in the poor woman's condition; it is the mens sana in corpore sano which alone possesses the power to receive and retain good impressions. Mr. Lane mentions a remarkable instance of a woman who was 20 times admitted to hospital and at last reformed—"Of all the women we ever received," he adds, "this was the most unpromising." The greatest error into which almost all the witnesses before the Commission, adverse to the Acts, fall, is to speak of the woman's detention in hospital as a punishment. Why, Sir, you cannot possibly confer upon her a greater advantage. Is it a punishment to place her under the care of a Miss Farrow, who reads to the girls on Sunday afternoons, and to whom the girls frequently say—these are her own words—"We wish you were not going out to-night that you might come down, and we might sing and have some reading." These are the girls of whom this excellent woman says—

"They are not girls with no reason in them. I think they are very much better than the world takes them to be."

The Report of the Commission does not use the language of exaggeration when it speaks of Miss Farrow, and other matrons, as "being animated by a benevolent zeal for the work in which they are engaged." I will not weary the House by enlarging on the deterrent effect of the Acts upon girls and married women. The evidence is very strong that they are, as the Report observes, "restrained from indulging in occasional licence by fear of the Acts." Mr. Wolferstan, a surgeon engaged in the administration of the Acts, but opposed to them, acknowledges that "the Acts have a deterrent effect in preventing women from becoming common prostitutes." I will only cite one instance from among the numerous interesting cases mentioned in the Report of Captain Harris—"On 5th July, a married lady was found by Police-constable Disberry, in a brothel, in Pond Lane, Devonport, with a gentleman. She left at once on being spoken to. She came next day to the inspector, and thanked him for informing her as to the character of the house."

It is difficult to express a decided opinion respecting clandestine prostitution, and it must, more or less, always exist; but there is abundant proof that solicitation has greatly diminished, and that one temptation to vice is thereby removed. Although juvenile prostitution has, I believe, considerably decreased, it might be still further diminished were more stringent measures directed against brothel-keepers, when found harbouring girls under 16 years of age. Mr. Wreford, the Superintendent of Local Police at Devonport, disputes the accuracy of the Return relative to juvenile prostitution, furnished by Mr. Annis, the Inspector of Metropolitan Police; but the fact is, the local police have never been in a position to know anything about the matter. The only member of the local police who pretended to any knowledge was obliged to admit at an investigation that his figures were entirely incorrect. Mr. Wreford's evidence before the Commission was not satisfactory, because he admitted that, although figures furnished by himself, and afterwards discovered to be incorrect, were made use of at a public meeting, he did not deem it necessary to offer any explanation. With respect to the women known at Aldershot as "Bushrangers," and at the Curragh as "Wrens," the effect produced by the Acts is perfectly marvellous. Dr. Barr, who went to Aldershot from the Lock Hospital in London, testified that—

"The women were very dirty—in fact, filthy, covered with vermin, like idiots, in their manner, very badly diseased; they almost burrowed in the ground like rabbits, digging holes for themselves in the sandbanks. They were, at first, very violent, but I reasoned with them, and the chaplain seconded my efforts, and very shortly afterwards they began to improve."

And with regard to the disease, Dr. Barr says—

"There has been a very remarkable diminution in the severity of the disease at Aldershot."

And the Matron at the Kildare Hospital speaks quite as hopefully of the "Wrens" at the Curragh, who were, if possible, worse than the "Bushrangers" at Aldershot. And now, Sir, will the House allow me to say one or two words on a most important—I may say vital—point. I mean the transmission of disease. Sir James Paget remarks—

"It would be difficult to overstate the amount of damage that syphilis does to the population, and that a number of children are born subject to diseases which render them quite unfit for the work of life."

Mr. Lane says—

"The amount of secondary disease has certainly diminished, and unless there is secondary disease, there is no fear of transmission."

But the Medical Officer of the Privy Council observes—

"There are strong reasons for believing that the gain so purchased (by the Contagious Diseases Acts) would, on analysis, be found to belong very predominantly to those kinds of venereal disease in which the community has little or no personal interest."

Now, we all know that Mr. Simon is a most excellent and public officer, but ne autor ultra crepidom. I do not depreciate Mr. Simon when I say that, on such a point, Mr. Lane's opinion is infinitely more weighty. Mr. Lane was asked whether he agreed with that statement—

"No; I do not," he replied. "The most serious affections have been the most influenced by the Acts, and I cannot help thinking, if the Medical Officer of the Privy Council had seen much of the practical working of the Acts, he would not have made the statement quoted."

Why, Sir, at that very time, Mr. Lane had a case in the Lock Hospital of a girl, aged 22, who had been a year diseased, literally from the crown of her head to the soles of her feet, and through no fault of her own. She contracted the disease in nursing the child of a friend. She kissed that child who was diseased, and had secondary spots on its mouth, and got a sore on her mouth with the awful result described. The child had got the disease from the mother who was infected by her husband. In the papers published by the opponents of the Acts, it is urged that you do not protect the children of parents who have small-pox; certainly not, for the obvious reason that small-pox is not a transmissible disease. But it is urged all the good you effect will be produced equally well by voluntary exertions. I do not deprecate the erection of voluntary Lock Hospitals; but let me ask my hon. Friend what is the difference in the sin, if it be a sin, of establishing Lock Hospitals supported by the State, and of establishing Lock Hospitals supported by private individuals? Will he define the distinction—a distinction as it appears to me without a difference—between sin committed by an individual and sin committed by an aggregate of individuals termed the State? Mr. Berkeley Hill informs us that he treats several hundreds of women as out-patients at the Lock Hospital, and as he phrases it “patches them up.” Surely, the opponents of these Acts ought to oppose this “patching up,” for, from their point of view, it must render sin more attractive and also more safe. But, Sir, it will be a long time before you are able to provide sufficient Lock accommodation—

“There is,” says Mr. Lane, “the greatest difficulty in getting funds. The London Lock Hospital has very influential support and very energetic management, and yet it is almost impossible to keep 30 beds going. The accommodation in London and most large towns for venereal cases is very small;”

but still it would appear in some cases more than equal to the demand—for

“At Winchester,” he adds, “there was a ward for this disease at the Hospital there; for years past it has been unoccupied, and no patients have gone in on the voluntary system, although when the Acts were applied to Winchester, no less than 43 per cent of the women examined were found to be diseased.”

Then, Sir, Mr. Lane observes—

“Disease on the voluntary side is very much more severe than that on the Government side. The contrast is very remarkable.”

And the reason for this is, he says—

“Patients on the voluntary side, as a rule, are not admitted till the disease has reached a very serious state.”

The reason why I quote Mr. Lane so much is not only on account of his eminence in the treatment of this disease, but because he has under his care both voluntary and Government patients. He says about one-fourth of the voluntary patients leave the Hospital uncured and in a condition to communicate disease, and he thus succinctly sums up the disadvantages of the voluntary system—“It acts badly at both ends; they will not come in soon enough or stay in long enough.” Of the admissions on the Government side in 1868 nearly half of them were girls not more than 20 years of age. Just conceive, Sir, the unspeakable blessing to these poor children of being thus placed under the care of able physicians, instead of being treated by quacks in brothels. I have the greatest admiration and respect for Bible women and Mission women who try to effect the reclamation of women by seeking them in brothels; but it is quite evident that they cannot hope successfully to compete with chaplains, medical officers, and matrons in well-appointed hospitals. An hon. and gallant Friend, uncertain how to vote, told me some days ago his decision would be made by the way in which these Acts had affected the health of the Army. He must be gratified by the Return which he received on Saturday, than which nothing can be more satisfactory. As the Paper is in the hands of hon. Members, I will only say that whereas 1874 appears to have been an exceptional year, when the decrease in the ratio of admissions for the more serious type of disease at the unsubjected groups was unusually large, the relative position of the two groups, however, is still maintained, that of the subjected having a ratio of less than the half of that of the groups at which the Acts have not been applied. The Report alludes to the Royal Warrant of October, 1873, empowering commanding officers to deprive soldiers of their pay when in hospital through their own misconduct—a Warrant for which we ought to be grateful to Lord Cardwell. Hon. Members may, perhaps, not be aware that soldiers may also be kept 28 days in barracks for concealing disease, and the double penalty inspires considerable dread. Regarding the relative amount of disease in the British and Foreign Armies, some interesting statistics are furnished by Mr. Acton, who has paid great attention to the subject. He visited Paris and Brussels last year, and in the latter place, in a body of 3,500 men, he found only five cases of primary syphilis, and in Paris 14 cases in all, among 3,841 men forming six regiments, taken at random in the garrison of that city. In the same year Mr. Acton visited the hospitals of the brigade of Guards in London, and found one-fifth of the whole force suffering from primary syphilis. Thus one battalion of 500 men in London showed more disease than 3,841 troops forming part of the French garrison. I am really sorry to trespass on the patience of the House, but I must allude to the charges which from time to time have been made against the police. The charges produced before the Commissioners were thoroughly investigated, and the Commissioners report—

"We have made inquiries into every case in which names and details were given. The result of our inquiries has been to satisfy us that the police are not chargeable with any abuse of their authority, and that they have hitherto discharged a difficult duty with moderation and caution."

I wish I could stop here. I wish my hon. Friend had not introduced into this debate the name of one who is now no more. But, while we ought not recklessly to recall the weaknesses and failings of the dead, we cannot leave unrefuted attacks on the character of the living. Inquiries which I have made into the circumstances attending the death of Mrs. Percy have satisfied me that she was not quite the immaculate person my hon. Friend supposes her to have been. I understand that during the life of her late husband she led, to his great grief, a very immoral life, and that she trained up her daughter in the same evil way. After the death of her husband, she resided at Aldershot with one Mrs. Jewitt, who, however, gave her, as well as her daughter, notice to quit, because a sergeant of the 78th Highlanders was found in the house about half-past 11 o'clock. They then lived with a Mrs. Davis, who soon followed Mrs. Jewitt's example, because two soldiers remained with them all night. They then took up their abode immediately opposite the residence of one of the metropolitan police constables, who on the night of March 8th saw them with two soldiers—Private Miller, of the 47th Regiment, and Corporal Hogg, of the 84th Regiment. The men were acting indecently both with mother and daughter. At midnight on the 9th of March both women went home, accompanied by two men in plain clothes, one of whom entered the house and remained till nearly noon the next day. It was then decided to bring them under the Acts; and they were ordered to attend for examination, but declined and left Aldershot. On March 13th a man named Ritson, who had three times deserted from the Royal Artillery and discharged as a bad character, called on the inspector and said that if Mrs. Percy was allowed to return he would undertake to live with her. The inspector replied that she and her daughter were at liberty to return. The mother returned and lived with Ritson at Aldershot, and as she lived with this one man she was never addressed by any member of the police force up to the time of her death. On the night of March 27th she left a public-house with a soldier of the 65th Regiment. He was stopped by the military police and sent back to his quarters. She was very drunk at the time and could hardly stand, and it was ascertained that she did not go home that night. The only person who saw her alive after that was a private in the Army Service Corps. He stated that he saw her the next morning on the towing-path on the other side of the canal. The jury, of course, returned an open verdict. These are the circumstances, so far as I have been able to ascertain, attending the death of the unfortunate woman, and I submit that the inspector of police showed moderation and forbearance in the discharge of his difficult duty. And now, Sir, is there any real demand for the abolition of these Acts? I have watched the numerous Petitions presented to this House against them, and have observed that by far the greater number come from the unprotected districts, where the effect of their operation is unknown. Sir, I am entitled to ask my hon. Friend what he proposes to substitute for these Acts? He will surely not be content with carrying their unconditional repeal! Does he intend to adopt the legislation proposed by Lord Alderdale, who although strongly opposing the Acts, unfortunately had not the courage of his convictions? If so, I venture to predict he will be abandoned by many of his followers. He may please Mr. Rylands, but will offend Mr. Jacob Bright. He will certainly not find favour with the gentlemen who drew up a long memorial or protest against the encouragement afforded to prostitution by these Acts, but inserted in the memorial a paragraph so ominous that I hope the House will allow me to read it—

“A large number of women who practise prostitution more or less continuously, but who have not adopted it as a profession, also resist registration. To be registered, and, if found diseased, to be forcibly carried off and imprisoned in a hospital would change the whole structure and arrangement of their lives; the relations which they have formed would be abruptly ended; milliners, dressmakers, sempstresses, domestic servants, &c., who eke out a precarious existence, or provide themselves with coveted luxuries in the form of dress, &c., by recourse to occasional prostitution, would at once lose their business connections, or, if in situations, would be discharged. Their characters would be lost, and they would find it impossible to reinstate themselves in their former positions in life.”

Sir, I really think this a remarkable plea in a memorial deprecating the Acts as favouring prostitution. Is the House prepared to repeal these beneficent Acts? Will it, in the face of the opinions of more than 80 of our most eminent physicians, take no thought for posterity? Will it allow this generation to beget children?

Progeniem vitiosiore[m]?”

More especially I ask—Will Parliament consign the poor outcast to life-long misery? Think of her as she once crouched and burrowed in the ground at Aldershot, calling out in her agony—“Do not touch me or I shall fall to pieces,” and of her as she now is in hospital, attended, sympathized with, and cared for. Think of her as she once crouched naked behind the bushes of the Curragh, and of her now clothed and in her right mind. I ask the House not to send her back to those dens of infamy where there is no eye to pity, and no arm to save. Violate, if you please, the principles of Magna Charta, but do not violate the commands or disregard the injunctions of One who took these poor women under His especial protection, and who taught us by His example to seek and save that which was lost.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Colonel Alexander.)

Mr. HOPWOOD: Sir—I wish I had self-possession at my command to express in fitting terms the feelings I have upon these Acts, and to pass in review the many arguments which have been addressed to the House on the subject. I feel some apology is due to the House that I thrust myself into the matter at all, when I feel there are hon. Gentlemen here more able to do it; but I have this excuse—that I have for some years past devoted myself to this question, and was informed upon it to some extent in earlier life, when I was told that abroad they had an admirable system, that they provided against all the evils of irregular intercourse, and that it would be better for this country to adopt that system. But when it was urged that this vice was to be committed with impunity, and that the State was to recognize it, I confess I felt very indignant. I was rejoiced to hear the way in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) has, with the courtesy belonging to the Service he is connected with, for the first time in this House, by an opponent of the Bill, done some justice to the motives of the excellent women in England who have endeavoured to stir up some feeling in this matter. If I have any right to speak on behalf of these women, they, I am sure, will recognize with satisfaction the appreciation which has been shown of the position in which they have placed themselves in this matter; and they had a perfect right to do it. Certain noble women of England felt that an act of duty was to be done; and they have done it with effect, and the effect is daily increasing on this question. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, in concluding a most eloquent peroration, alluded to the Divine Master, whose teachings are recognized in this House, as if in reproof of the course we pursue; but does it occur to him that there may be more difficulty in the matter than he perceives or appreciates? We desire to do all that is benevolent towards these women. We desire also to protect the liberties of other women, who might be involved with them. As far as I remember, these Acts involve any woman whom any policeman may, in his view, believe to be a common prostitute. She is then liable to be subjected to a surgical examination, which is accompanied by some pain. Would the hon. and gallant Gentleman say the doctrines of our Divine Master are against us in trying to stop this? It often happens that women who are ill, whether diseased or not, are liable to be detained in the hospital. "Oh!" but says the hon. and gallant Gentleman, "detention is no punishment!" I would like to ask him how he would like to be confined even in his own dining-room for five days? Is not detention a punishment? What is the fact? These Acts say, if any woman is in a natural condition and cannot be examined, detain her five days! "Oh!" says the hon. and gallant Gentleman, "that is keeping her from the streets; it is doing her good." When we say these things ought not to be done, we are told we are not fulfilling the commands of our Divine Master! Who is to define a common prostitute? The Act is directed against common prostitutes, and yet is there any definition of one? The hon. and gallant Gentleman says that acts of irregularity come under the cognizance of the police. How should the police be arbiters of morality and justice? Where are they authorized to do anything of the sort? The hon. and gallant Gentleman says they have no alternative but to put any woman on the register whom they believe to be a prostitute. These cases differ from the paternal Government of France in this—that in France a father, after he hears his daughter is to be put upon the register, has a right to come and take her away. These Acts of England do nothing of the sort, and yet we are setting up the police as a moralizing agency, to call up people who are masters of their own lives, and to warn them not to pursue the course they assume they are going upon. Police in plain clothes, who act as spies, are known by sight to the servant girls, who actually leave their friends or followers, and run in alarm from the spot. Why is this to be borne? Is it in the British House of Commons we are to be told that women are to be terrorized in this fashion, and that policemen are so to conduct themselves that they are to be terrors to those who are walking harmlessly about with those to whom they are most attached? I find the last Return has been specially manufactured for this occasion, and has been made to support these Acts. What do these Returns say of a benevolent policeman who met a married woman on one occasion and actually took upon himself to give her a warning. It relates with naïveté that she was dreadfully distressed. Now, what right has the police, what right has this House to engage in this matter of morality. [Laughter.] I see hon. Gentlemen opposite smile. I wish them joy of the feeling they have created. Again, in another part of this Return, a policeman actually warns a governess of 18 or 19 years of age, who had trusted somebody as she ought not to have trusted him. Again the officer steps in. What right has he to do so? Let me ask hon. Gentlemen in this House, if there are any such who have been guilty of acts of this kind—and let him that is without sin cast the first stone—if they would like a policeman to dodge about after them and put their names on the register? If any such attempt were made would not the streets be rife with violence? Death would be the penalty if such insults were put upon Englishmen. The hon. and gallant Gentleman says that this is not recognition of prostitution as a State institution. Is it not? Prior to this, every brothel in the land might be made the subject of a prosecution. What do you do now? On the face of it you say, the only offence we make by laws in regard to brothels under these Acts is, that if any diseased prostitute is found in them, the keeper of the brothel shall be fined. Under the old law, a brothel-keeper was liable to two years' imprisonment; now it is brought down to a fine. Brothel-keepers are told that if they will come and tell who is diseased, they shall be protected in their calling and occupation. Does not the State recognition amount to this? You set up a staff of officers at £50,000 a-year, and enable them to bring up every woman whom they say is a common prostitute, or who has been temporarily erring. It is true you have provided chaplains. Is not that a hypocritical homage paid to virtue? The hon. and gallant Gentleman says the work of bringing these poor women back from the paths of vice cannot be accomplished by voluntary action. Now, Sir, in allusion to that divine aspect of the question of which we have heard, what is the fact with regard to these women? A woman is enrolled in this register, and what is the effect of that? Ask those who have seen the system in operation abroad, and they will tell you that the consequence is this—that, having once been placed on that roll, they feel that they have passed the gulf, or rather that they have fully descended into the gulf of despair as soon as the act of registration is accomplished. The evidence we have from abroad is that the hospitals provided for these unfortunate women are the vilest sinks that exist in the world, where the woman, who is not yet so debased as others, may be brought down to the lowest degradation that a woman can undergo; for there are shades of difference between the commonest of the common and the lowest of the low, and by this degrading confinement in these hospitals, you lower beyond hope of recovery those who have as yet perhaps but just entered on the verge of vice and who might otherwise have a chance of retracing their steps. But here all chance of that is gone. It is all very well for the police to say that there are some they do not put down on the register, and for hon. Members to say that when they are put down on the register, they can get off when they like; but I have proofs which show that it is the most difficult thing in the world to get off that register. Even marriage will not do it; nothing will do it. It is not enough to say that a respectable woman may, and does sometimes submit herself to examination. How can you draw a parallel between the two cases? It is absurd to draw a comparison between such cases, and I should be doing the hon. and gallant Member an injustice if I supposed that he could pretend to draw such a parallel. As to the treatment to which these women are subjected, do they not dread it? With reference to one case to which reference has been made, the hon. and gallant Gentleman has forgotten what transpired at the inquest; for, most distinctly, there was evidence that the woman was labouring under the fear of the Acts. She declared that they would lead to her end, and her end shortly followed. A woman may be a paragon of virtue, and yet liable to this sort of treatment. Why must it be assumed that everybody is a common prostitute? And yet such is the effect of these Acts. Spy police are introduced into the protected districts—spy police, be it known, in plain clothes—to ransack the town. And what is the policeman's duty? Why, the moment he sees a woman in the streets who may be out a little after the time which the wisdom of the Legislature has fixed as the limit of morality, he is to pounce upon her. Workmen's wives, workmen's daughters—even servants—if they have occasion to be out beyond that hour, may be subjected to inspection. How else can it be? You cannot blame the police. Their duty is to make themselves masters of the situation, and to learn what is the course of proceeding of every woman in the place. How can you be surprised, then, if there should be mistakes? It is not for us to show you the mistakes. Who would be foolish enough to think of bringing up a woman from these protected districts, who had been falsely accused? Would they not rather prefer to go to the police, and beseech them not to spread such evidence about their character, not daring to do anything more in the matter? They might be women above suspicion, whom only the policeman has solicited; and would they care to have their names put to such uses? As to soliciting, there is no law of solicitation as between man and woman. There is no such legal power as to give a man into custody for it. It was sought by the Bill brought in by Mr. Bruce (now Lord Aberdare) to give certain powers with regard to solicitations by a woman, and it was proposed on the other hand to give similar powers with respect to solicitation by a man; but, though there is a general power to appeal to the police in a case of molesting, there is no power to prevent soliciting. Yet, in some of these protected districts you have gone to the extreme of harshness and severity, and the case of Mrs. Percy does not stand alone. From the reply to Captain Harris's Report, issued by the National Medical Association for the Repeal of the Acts, referring to the case of Elizabeth Jane Brown, who drowned herself under Plymouth Hoe, on the 1st of July, 1874, it appeared that—"She had often complained of the harsh treatment she had met with from the police and the surgeon, and had once before attempted to destroy herself by cutting her throat, but had recovered from the wound. She had said that rather than be compelled to submit to such treatment as she had met with in the examination room she would drown herself, and she did so. Rachel House, also, was put in solitary confinement in the Royal Albert Hospital, and committed suicide on May 28, 1869, by throwing herself out of the window; and Emily Mulcarty (née Moore) drowned herself at Millbay, on the 16th April, 1873. She was on the register at Devonport, and was married a few months prior to committing suicide, 'but had not been able to get her name removed from the register.' "

These were some of the cases which showed the effect of the existing legislation. The hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke of the deterrent effect of the Acts in question; but what was the theme of his panegyric? Not that it was a deterrent with regard to men, but that it was a deterrent with respect to women, from terror of going on the register. Reference was made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman to the case of Aldershot; but I had always thought, from what I have seen of the Articles of War and camp regulations, that there was already sufficient power to remove persons from the neighbourhood, at all events, that there was power to appeal to the police. It is all a question of order, and nothing is needed but to put in force the regulations which most of these localities already possess. With regard to the transmission of disease, nobody denies it; but the fact is, that our system is ineffectual to prevent it. With regard to the prevalence of disease, I venture to assert—and I can bear out the assertion by statistics—that before the Acts in dispute came into operation it had been rapidly decreasing. I can cite the authority of Sir James Paget, that it was become, comparatively, innocuous—that is, as compared with what it was 30 or 40 years ago. I can supply figures laid before the Royal Commission by Mr. Buxton, showing that the disease had been decreasing in the Army—I do not say in the Navy—for some years before the Acts came into force. We deny that the decrease has been due to the operation of the Acts. With regard to the dangerous form of the disease, I have to point out that, though the right hon. Gentleman has moved for Returns from the Army, he has not moved for Returns from the Navy; and if he consults the Blue Book, he will find, with regard to the Navy, that the attempt to deal with it has been a failure from beginning to end. With regard to the Army—

how are we to check it? The Returns are not reliable. Those who made them believed what they returned, perhaps; but, for the most part, they not only believed what they returned, but they returned that which they desired to believe. I will not put myself under any quorum of doctors, nor under a quorum of paid officials, who, more especially if they are policemen, never think they can have powers enough. I reject their statistics. I have already said with regard to disease that it was decreasing before these Acts came into operation, and I might cite, besides Sir James Paget and Mr. Buxton already referred to, the names of Dr. Brewer and Mr. Henry Lee in support of my case; but I will not detain the House longer. I congratulate the House and the country upon the altered tone of debate which is observable in this matter, and on the fact that no conspiracy of silence, no spying of Strangers has met us on this occasion, neither is it any longer necessary to deliberate on the question with closed doors—a question which it is admittedly our duty to discuss, and which I believe it is necessary for us at once and finally to decide. I look upon that as one of the best features in the present state of the subject.

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE thought the hon. Member who had spoken last (Mr. Hopwood) had hardly done justice to the House when he talked of the "conspiracy of silence," because it must be remembered that on two former occasions the subject had been fully and fairly discussed. He agreed that, however disagreeable the subject might be, it was the right and even the duty of the House to discuss it, and he felt certain when he saw into whose hands the advocacy of the repeal of the Acts had fallen, that there would be nothing in the language used to which exception could be taken. The hon. Baronet the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone) had shown, as might have been expected of him, that the question might be discussed without that intemperate language which augured a weak case; without imputing unworthy motives to those who differed with him, and without rendering it necessary that the debate should be conducted with closed doors. He hoped to follow that example. He could not complain of the question being again brought forward, although it seemed to him that the arguments urged in favour of the Acts in 1870 and 1873 were unanswerable. But when we regarded the number of most estimable people who still objected to this legislation, we could not be surprised at their desire to make their arguments heard in that House. He could not, however, allow that the opponents of these Acts had a right to claim a monopoly of benevolence and high feeling, while attributing to others no higher motive than expediency. The opponents of the Bill also had mothers, sisters, and wives, and why should they have less regard for women? They numbered among their ranks at least as many who were well known for high and irreproachable character, and if expedience was talked of, would it not be pleasanter both for them as individuals and for the Government to earn a cheap popularity by yielding to a popular cry? He was glad that the hon. Baronet had cleared the ground by admitting his wish to stamp out the disease, if possible, by voluntary agency; for he simply objected to compulsion. But that was not the case with the great mass of the opponents of the Acts, judging from the communications which had reached him. They chiefly inveighed against the iniquity of making vice safe. But those who held these opinions must object as much to the voluntary as to compulsory treatment. Those who considered disease to be a Heaven-sent punishment for the terror of evil-doers must shut up the Lock hospitals, proscribe remedies, make the disease as terrible as in the Middle Ages, and gain for their results a population rapidly dying out, as in New Zealand, or as it was in Tahiti, before laws similar to these were enforced there. It was said—he hoped and believed truly—that a diminution in vice and disease had arisen from the better condition and higher character of the soldier, and hon. Gentlemen relied on higher motives for still further diminution. He hoped that reliance was not ill-founded, but if the diminution had been and would be due to these motives, what became of the other argument—that vice would increase in proportion as you made it safer. He would not stop that disease had diminished in which the Acts were in were in the hands of

 they could judge for themselves; but this one fact must be not lost sight of—namely, that the Army had fluctuated in members since 1860, that it was reduced in round numbers from 84,000 to 60,000 before 1866, and had since been increased to 85,000, and that disease was always far less during reduction, when there was little recruiting, and the worst characters were got rid of, and that it increased largely during augmentation, young recruits being especially liable to it. It must also be remembered that the calculations of their opponents were sometimes drawn from the whole of England, which were necessarily misleading, the number of protected places being but few, and that in 1866 the areas of many protected places, notably Devonport, was increased while the names remained the same; so that an apparent increase of disease was really due to the enlarged area to which the Acts extended. It seemed to him that the Government was bound to accept the statements of their own officers in preference to those of irresponsible persons or societies. Those officers were selected men, and liable to ruinous results if detected in false Returns. They had, therefore, no inducement to say anything but what was true, unless it was supposed that successive Governments had ordered the manipulation of Returns, which they of all people must desire to have as accurate as possible. Was it creditable that Governments should continue and defend the operations of their opponents, knowing that the results of those operations were injurious or illusory? Well, but from these Returns, made by responsible people, we were told that a saving to the Army of 648 men daily—not 50, as had been stated—had been effected; that bad houses were shut up, that women were withdrawn from the streets, and many of them prevented from appearing there again; that the streets were orderly and quiet, and when these results, which were long denied, could be denied no longer, were we to be told that these advantages resulted from ordinary causes, and that the Acts contained no provisions for these things, nor were they part of the original scheme? But, if so, why did we not get the same reports from unprotected places? He was not arguing now for the extension of these Acts over the whole country, nor defending their original intention, though it might easily be done; and he might say that the Act of 1866 provided especially for moral and religious instructions in the hospitals by a clause originally proposed by the present First Lord of the Admiralty. What he did say was that the results of those Acts, as furnished by responsible officers, with every motive for accuracy, were such that no Government would be justified in repealing them. But, it was said, why not trust to a voluntary system? Why should Government recognize vice as a necessity, and why subject women to unconstitutional compulsion and detention unknown elsewhere and not applied to the other sex? That objection applied as much to the voluntary as the compulsory system, and those who used this argument of recognition of vice should go further and make prostitution illegal and subject to penalties. He did think the examination of men might be carried further. But it was forgotten that there was compulsory detention under the Poor Law of paupers afflicted with contagious diseases of whatever sex. He, for one, would much prefer the voluntary system if it could be carried out. We learned, however, that it was a failure, and we should expect it to be so from analogy. What was the principle of detention in reformatories? Was it not that those who had not strength to separate themselves voluntarily from bad company might, by compulsory separation, have a chance of reformation? Were not people in all ranks obliged sometimes to separate their sons compulsorily from bad associates? The result had been very marked in the case of younger women. Attempts had been made to show that women remained longer in a profligate course on account of the profit of the monopoly they enjoyed owing to the withdrawal of some of them by means of these Acts, and this argument was based on the fact that the average age was greater, but that was accounted for by the withdrawal of the younger, and if the argument were carried out to its legitimate conclusion it would point to a desire for augmentation of numbers, which would be a very curious position to be taken up by their opponents. It was to be expected that the older women were less easily reclaimed; they were, of course, the most dangerous to society; and when it was said that men were never innocent, that might be true in a sense, but hardly in that in which it is used. If he remembered rightly there was a passage in the Book of Proverbs about "a simple one" and "a woman subtle of heart," which illustrated what he meant. No doubt, the system of reformation was imperfect, affecting those only who were fit inmates for hospitals. To be fully carried out it should sweep off all who were on the streets. This was the weak point; but he could only deal with what was possible. All who had had anything to do with the ticket-of-leave question knew that in the early days of the system there were constant complaints of people being dogged by the police, and thus prevented from earning a living. These complaints were sometimes heard still, and, without saying that there had been no foundation in them, no one would deny that they had been grossly exaggerated. He was warranted in saying the same of complaints made against the police employed in carrying out these Acts, because the Report of the Commission pronounced against the truth of the allegations up to that time; and with respect to a painful case which had occurred recently, and to which allusion had been made, he could corroborate the statement of the hon. and gallant Officer who had so ably spoken (Colonel Alexander), that an official report gave a very different complexion, both to the previous history of the poor woman and the probable cause of her sad end. It used to be said that women, however kind and charitable to the failings and miseries of others, were intolerant of the fallen of their own sex, that—

"Every woe a tear could claim, Except an erring sister's shame."

There was some now who had nobly wiped off this reproach, who had not thought that their purity could be sullied by penetrating the haunts of vice, and endeavouring to reclaim the degraded creatures who were the objects of these Acts. All honour to them for it; but while far from joining in the outcry against them, he doubted whether they were the best judges in such matters. Their own pure minds could not fathom the depth of degradation into which these poor creatures had sunk, and their generous feelings caused them to resent the apparent injustice which had in all ages, and for obvious reasons made the lot of erring woman harder than that of the equally guilty of our own sex. They had, unfortunately, for these reasons set themselves against a system which he believed in his conscience was, if not the only one, at any rate the most powerful, which mere human agency could devise for the reclamation of fallen women. Their strong prejudices and overwrought feelings made them credulous and unsuspicious on one side, and very hard to convince on the other. When instruments were wanted, they were usually found ready to hand, and with motives not always so unexceptionable as their employers. When victims and martyrs were in demand, victims and martyrs would be forthcoming. In the heated atmosphere of public meetings, strong statements were accepted as facts, and hypothetical cases excited the indignation of a credulous audience as if they had really any existence except in the imagination of the narrator. The most modest demand for proof was looked upon as the proof of malignant hostility, so that for the advocates of the impeached measures to meet their adversaries on their own platform was impossible. But they did not shrink from meeting their opponents in the arena of that House. They relied upon a change of public opinion, tardy perhaps, but sure to come. Time was on their side. Even now the attack began to slacken, and many who were opponents of the Acts, while they confined themselves to reading what had been written against them, became zealous advocates when they had watched their working for themselves. For himself, if he believed that the motives of those who promoted these Acts were black as they had been painted, far from supporting, he would not like to sit on the same bench in that House with them. He believed that the benefits of these Acts were great to the country, and to that Army and Navy which were so necessary to its existence. But he would give up those benefits, he would let the soldiers and sailors take care of themselves, if he thought that such advantages were purchased by the injuries and degradation of women such as had been alleged by their opponents. It was because in his conscience he believed that the unhappy women who were brought under these Acts, so far from being degraded, were drawn from the depths of degradation, so far from being injured, had the prospect of being restored to respectability—it was because he could not endure to thrust them back into the pit from which they had been dragged that he could not bring himself to agree to the repeal of this legislation.

MR. CHILDERS: The question before the House is not a very savoury one, or a subject which one would select for the expression of opinion, but I feel it to be almost a matter of duty on my part to say a few words upon it. First, because I do not quite concur in the view that has been taken by hon. Gentlemen on either side, and also because it was my lot to administer these Acts for between two and three years in two different capacities when I was at the Admiralty; and, so far as the Act of 1869 was concerned, to promote that legislation, altering, to a certain extent, the provisions of the Act of 1866. Under these circumstances, I think I am bound to state to the House the reasons for the vote I shall give on this question, and to justify the view I take as to the best method of administering this portion of our legislation in future. I would first, in a very few words, remind the House of what the history of these Acts has been. After the Crimean War broke out, when the Army and the Navy, or at least those portions of them which were to be found in our arsenal and dockyard towns, were increased, there arose a desire to improve the sanitary condition of the Forces, and that desire, which was promoted with so much zeal by the late Lord Herbert, induced the Admiralty to endeavour to do something towards checking the enormous amount of disease that prevailed both amongst our soldiers and our sailors. The result was the Act of 1864, which was based upon a very intelligible principle, differing in many respects from that of the succeeding Act of 1866. It established no register whatever, either with respect to our garrison towns or otherwise. It subjected prostitutes to no periodical examination, but simply established certain hospitals for prostitutes who might be found to be diseased, and empowered the magistrates on the information of an officer of the police, who had reason to believe that the particular woman or women in question were diseased, to have them sent to these hospitals. The Act of 1864 was followed by an inquiry conducted under the direction of the Admiralty and the War Office; and in 1866, the Act which has been especially a subject of debate to-night was passed, involving a very great extension indeed of the provisions of the Act of 1864. Under the Act of 1866 we practically established in districts considerably larger than before, a register of all persons who might be called prostitutes, and were found in those districts, and compelled all those persons to appear once a fortnight for examination to see whether they were diseased or not. In the latter Act, as in the former, but more effectually, penalties were imposed on persons, not for harbouring prostitutes, but for harbouring prostitutes found to be diseased. The Act of 1869 was virtually an extension of the provisions of the Act of 1866, which had been found to be very imperfectly operative, because it only applied to garrison towns and great military stations. The Act of 1869 gave a very great extension to those districts—enlarging them to a considerable distance from those towns and stations, because it was found that if there were such places within reach of those towns and stations those who wished to engage in prostitution there could easily do so, the prostitutes must be reached from those centres. The Act of 1869 led to the appointment of the Commission of 1871, which proposed very large alterations indeed in the Acts of 1866 and 1869. They declared, practically, that the system of the registration and periodical compulsory examination of prostitutes was a failure. They distinctly recommended that it should be discontinued, and that we should revert to the Act of 1864, which established no such periodical or compulsory examination whatever, excepting in the case of prostitutes known or informed against as being diseased. The Commission also recommended that it was desirable to take the administration of the Acts out of the hands of the War Office and the Admiralty, and place it under the Home Office. They proposed that these provisions should be extended to all parts of the country, excepting London, or to those towns to which the inhabitants expressed a desire that they should be extended. The Commissioners made strong recommendations in the direction of increasing the penalties imposed on those who harboured prostitutes, or otherwise offered facilities for prostitution in the places to which the Acts applied. These were the recommendations of the Commission of 1871, and I venture to say that these recommendations pointed to an entire revolution in the system which was then in force. Practically, they advised the repeal of the whole of those Acts which had been the subject of public controversy, and recommended we should go back to the much more simple provisions and non-compulsory character of the Act of 1864; and I say that that was a wise proposal. Now, upon that, the Government was called upon to act in 1872. I was not a Member of that Government, and therefore can speak with perfect impartiality of the proposals which were then made. What were those proposals? The Bill of 1872 proposed absolutely and entirely to repeal the Acts of 1864, 1866, and 1869. No part of these Acts was to remain; no provision of these measures, with one exception, was to remain in operation, though specially referring to the garrison and dockyard towns. It was proposed that the whole of the Three Kingdoms should be under one uniform law, and have the same means of restraining disease. The one provision that went in the direction of the Acts of 1864, 1866, and 1869, was, that any prostitute who was found to be diseased might be sent to hospital. These were the provisions of the Bill of 1872. The House will see that the Report of the Royal Commission went to take the life altogether out of the Acts of 1864, 1866, and 1869; and the Government followed up that Report by recommending that those Acts should be repealed, and that the whole country should be brought under one law on the subject. That being the short history of the Acts, I will make a few remarks as to what has been said to-day and on former occasions as to the operation of those Acts of 1864, 1866, and 1869. I will allude to some points to which I do not think that full justice has been done with regard to those Acts. I took it upon me, with the assistance of officers, not long ago to investigate what was a special subject of controversy, and that was the actual working of the Acts in the districts where they have been in force, and it appears to me that the statistics which have been published by the Government on the authority of the police, have not been effectually broken down. In several respects I think that the operation of these Acts has been successful. I will not say so successful as those who have acted on these statistics may be inclined to think; there may be, and no doubt there are, some defects; but I do say that in respect of several of the most important points, those statistics which have been produced, and on which the War Office and the Admiralty have acted, have not been broken down. Being in possession of the facts on this subject, I should say distinctly that the number of young girls giving themselves to prostitution—the worst form of prostitution—has decidedly been reduced, and large numbers have been returned to their homes—large numbers, indeed, who, but for the operation of these Acts, would not have been returned to their homes. I will go further. So far as I can judge—though in this respect, there is the most extraordinary discrepancy between the statistics furnished by or supplied to the police, and those which appear in the official volume of statistics—I believe that the number of disorderly houses in the districts affected by the Acts has also been decidedly reduced. What has been the character of those houses? Those who know Portsmouth—who knew it before the Acts came into operation and who know it now—must know, perfectly well, that the character of these houses has been decidedly improved, and that this improvement may be traced to the operation of the Acts. That is the point about which doctors differ; but I say that the amount of disease has been reduced in those districts, and owing, as I believe, to these Acts. I allow for the improvement of the country generally, but still, making that allowance, I think, from the portion of the statistics I have been able to analyze, it is indisputable that credit is due to this legislation with regard to protecting districts and diminishing both the amount and the virulence of the disease. There are other points on which I cannot agree with the opponents of these Acts. It is said we ought not to maintain these Acts because the disease has been sent by Heaven as a punishment on those who indulge in vice. That is a very popular argument; but to say that a disease, which was unknown in this country until 200 or 300 years ago, has been sent as an antidote against vice, is a proposition which appears to me to be utterly untenable. There is another argument which I have heard with the greatest pain, and that is, it has been insinuated that the object of the promoters of these Acts was to supply healthy women for the use of the soldiers. That was not the object; the object was simply to prevent great mischief to our social condition, both with respect to the Army and the Navy, from the prevalence of disease. That was the whole and the sole object; and, I believe, it has been in a great measure realized. I think, however, that there are strong reasons why a very considerable change should take place in this legislation. In the first place it is faulty, inasmuch as it fails, in the most marked degree, with regard to the principle of equally treating the two sexes, which ought to be the basis of our legislation. The right hon. Gentleman the Paymaster General argued in favour of this legislation, on this ground—that just as we take steps to remove from children every kind of temptation, so we are entitled to impose upon a body of women who hold out temptation to our soldiers and sailors, an exceptionally strained law. That is an utterly untenable argument, and one which I was surprised to hear from the mouth of my right hon. Friend. The principle that we should apply, as far as possible, equal law to both sexes seems to me a great object. With respect to compulsory periodical examination, the Commission distinctly said that that was a thing which ought not to be maintained. What I would ask the House is, whether anything has occurred to show that public opinion on this point has altered since the date of the Commission's Report. If it has altered at all, it has been more in the direction of the Report than the other way. Public opinion is distinctly opposed to establishing such a rule as that these persons should be compulsorily examined once a fortnight, and that feeling has increased since 1871. Then we are met by the question—"If you propose to give up the Acts of 1866 and 1869, what are you to substitute for them? Are you prepared to repeal them simpliciter and leave the question to settle itself?" I infer from the speech of my right hon. Friend—reading between the lines—that he did not quite like the Acts himself, though he did not venture to suggest to the House any Amendment of them. Speaking for myself, I would suggest Amendments which I think might be adopted and which, repealing the Acts as they stand, would substitute provisions giving all the benefits of the Act of 1869. I will state in a few words what I would propose. I would abolish altogether both registration and compulsory periodical examination. I would continue the Lock hospitals for special districts, and would give women who applied a right to admission, with the condition that no one so admitted should be discharged until she had been either cured, or reported to be incurable. And I think it is fair to do so, without imposing expense upon the locality, because those districts are selected for the simple reason that in them is to be found a large number of persons, a considerable portion of them being bachelors from whom a great deal of incontinence springs, and I think that the localities are entitled to say that the special provisions in this respect should be defrayed at the cost of the country. I think that it would be perfectly legitimate to make this condition, that those who go into a Lock hospital should not be discharged from it until they are either cured, or stated to be incurable. I think that is a perfectly legitimate condition to be made; and, in my opinion, would have a beneficial effect. I would submit a system under which the penalties against harbouring prostitutes, not merely diseased prostitutes, were made very much more strict. I would also impose penalties under certain circumstances, as proposed in the Bill of 1872, against public solicitation. Then I would do this, which, I believe, every artizan in the Army and the Navy would be glad to see—that is to say, I would make the concealment of the fact of being diseased by a soldier or sailor in those districts, a very much more severe offence. It is now an offence, but a very slight offence; but I am sorry to say I cannot concur in the remark made by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Alexander), as to the result of the Regulation of 1873, under which a soldier sent to the hospital is mulcted of a certain portion of his pay. I may be wrong in saying that was a thing in the wrong direction, because it operated as an inducement to conceal it, and I think it would be much better to make the concealment of disease an offence, and that might be done with great and good effect to the soldiers and sailors. Then I would also introduce into the law a condition as to which I am bound to admit there is a considerable difference of opinion in the minds of the Commissioners, and the weight of evidence must be taken as against me. But, nevertheless, I have read the evidence of six of the most important and best witnesses, and as they strongly recommended this course, I think we might try the effect of a law which would make the wilful communication of disease, whether by a prostitute, or by a soldier, or a sailor, an offence. I know it is an open question, and I do not think I should insist upon it; but, at the same time, it is very strongly recommended by a number of witnesses, both those in favour of the Acts and those against them. I do not agree with those who think that we may treat women who give themselves up to prostitution in loco parentis, and deal with them as we choose; but I do believe that those of tender age—young girls who give themselves up to this practice—should be treated in loco parentis, and that provision may be made for doing all the good which has been done by the Act of 1866. It is hard to say when that power should cease; but that there should be an age below which any woman or girl found to be a prostitute should be compulsorily returned to her friends, or in case of their not being willing to receive her, should be sent to a home. Such a law would have to be administered with great care and delicacy, and it is not inconsistent with the general principle that we have no right to interfere with persons who think fit to commit acts of incontinence. But we have the right to deal with persons of tender age; and I think we should do so. Finally, it would be most unwise to do anything the effect of which would be to remove from the metropolitan police, who at present administer these Acts in our dockyards and garrisons, the responsibility of administering such a law. They have done so with marked success, and all the charges of unfairness have broken down; for, I may say, that 99 out of 100 have been groundless. It is very much more easy to administer an exceptional law of this kind by such a specially marked body as the metropolitan police, than by the ordinary borough or county police in which these districts are situated. And, therefore, acting upon the recommendation of the Commission of 1871, I would place the administration of the law, as I suggested it should be amended, under the Home Office and in the hands of the metropolitan police; and I firmly believe that such an amendment of the law, either with or without that special clause to which some exception was taken—and it is not one to which I attach much importance—such an amendment of the law would continue to increase the good effects of the Acts of 1864, 1866, and 1869; while, on the other hand, it would meet, and effectually meet, those objections to the Acts which I believe rather increase than diminish the evil. I think there ought to be special legislation for those districts, and strongly entertaining that view, I would support any measure that carried out that idea in the manner I have suggested.

MR. HENLEY: I wish to say a few words in support of the Motion of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Harcourt Johnstone). I shall not trouble the House by endeavouring to reconcile any conflicting statement as to whether the Acts have been more or less successful in the degree and hopes of those who introduced them; neither shall I trouble the House with any remarks upon the mode and manner in which those Acts have been put in force. So far as I know, subject to the mistakes that always must occur with any human action, I believe they have been put in force as the law has intended them to be put in force. There have been mistakes—in all human actions there will be; but I believe they have been put in force simply as the law intended they should be. Before any of these things, and before the mode of dealing with the subject was passed or introduced, I opposed the introduction of this legislation. I opposed it on the simple ground—which I stated at 3 o'clock in the morning—that it was no business of the State to provide clean sin for the people. In whatever country laws of this kind have been in force, they have been quickly followed—first of all, by the depravation of the moral sense, and, not long after, with the depravation of morals themselves. What are these laws? Here are people living—I will not say in defiance, but, certainly, in contradiction to the laws of God and man—and by the officers of justice you recognize them and take them in hand—not to deter, not to restrain, not to reform—but simply to see that they are in a fit condition for other persons who wish to carry on the same practice as themselves. And what has been the effect in these towns? I said that these laws would produce depravation of the moral sense. We have had Returns from those towns in which these things are stated—that these unfortunate people are better dressed, that they are more orderly and decent in their behaviour. And what does all that amount to, but that they are rejoicing that what is wrong, what is sinful, is to be stripped of all that is disgusting, and all that is abhorrent to the people's sight and view, and that you are to make these women more attractive for the calling which they are unhappily carrying on. If that is not an evidence of the depravation of the moral sense, I do not know what is. What will it necessarily lead to? Can you make the people whom you wish to obey God's law, believe that you are sincere in that, when you uphold these things, especially when you make people who carry on these practices more attractive and less repulsive? As I have said before, when this sort of law exists, that sort of depravation of the moral sense follows. I held that opinion when the laws were introduced, and I hold it now; and I am therefore glad to record my opinion upon it. I believe, also, that the laws have failed very much in the object for which they were introduced. I believe you know very little of the actual state of matters, for you have given up all examination of men. Therefore, you know nothing but of the men who come to you; and while they can go to a chemist's shop and get relief at a low cost and no stoppage of pay, anyone who knows anything about human nature knows that they are not likely to come to you. These are my reasons for voting against the measures, and I am glad of having one more opportunity of raising my voice against them.

MR. MASSEY : Sir, having served on the Royal Commission, I hope to be allowed to trespass upon the House for a few moments while I state the conclusions I have arrived at after a careful examination of this subject. The Royal Commission comprised several Gentlemen who are strongly adverse to the policy of these Acts, and also those who were in favour of them. There was also a neutral party on the Commission, which was open to conviction upon the subject. Of that party I formed one. I entered into that Commission with no bias, either in favour or against the Acts. We prosecuted the inquiry in a painstaking way, and in as judicial manner as any Commission that ever sat. Our inquiry lasted for 45 days, and we examined 80 witnesses. The cases which came before the Commission were well inquired into. It was alleged, in the first place, that this legislation was immoral in itself; it was alleged, in the second place, that its practical tendency was towards immorality; in the third place, the efficacy of the Acts for the purpose for which they were framed was denied; and, lastly, it was alleged that the administration of these Acts was grossly abused. I need not detain the House with any lengthened observations upon the first head of objection. It is sufficient for me to say that Acts which obtained the entire concurrence of a large body of persons, comprising every class of society, from magistrates to clergymen of all denominations, cannot fairly be called immoral. Well, Sir, as regards the second objection, that they were immoral in their tendency, that was one of a practical nature, and which demanded strict inquiry, because we felt that if any one of those cardinal objections, which were urged against the Acts, could be substantiated, it was impossible to defend them, but that the whole policy must be abandoned. We inquired, with very great care, as to their alleged immoral tendency. We took a very large body of evidence on this subject, and the result of that investigation was, that the number of prostitutes and the number of brothels had been very materially reduced since the Acts came into operation; and one fact which made a very great impression, as it naturally would upon the Commission, was, that the Acts had been most effectual in deterring young girls from entering the profession. The evidence was most express upon that subject, and the result was, I think I may say, the unanimous conviction of the Commission that, to a greater or less degree, that the Acts had achieved a very great success; and certainly if any legislation could be credited with such an achievement as that of deterring young girls and thoughtless creatures from entering upon a career which must result in their physical and moral ruin, much could be said for such legislation, and I think the House would pause before they abandoned it. It was said, however, that although public prostitution appeared to be diminishing, yet it was in a great degree supplanted by clandestine vice. On that point there was a great deal of evidence, and it was extremely difficult to get at the truth of the matter. There were general statements that clandestine prostitution had in a great measure ceased. I, for one, was not prepared to go that length; but I felt satisfied, and I joined my Colleagues in thinking that the weight of the evidence was in favour of the views of the police upon that subject. Now, Sir, I should be very glad to corroborate these statements by quotations from the Report of the Commission; but at this late period, and as other Gentlemen are desirous of speaking, I will not detain the House with quotations from the Report. As to the statements that the Acts are inefficacious, we took a very large body of evidence; and I must refer very shortly to one or two paragraphs which appeared on that point. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill, referred to the evidence of the surgeons, and quoted Sir James Paget. He might have referred to Sir William Jenner, who also gave evidence as to the transmission of syphilis. But the great majority of opinion in the medical body is that the effect of this foul disease is not confined to the sufferers and to the sinners themselves, but that it is visited not only upon the next generation, but upon succeeding generations, who are innocent of the offence. We then inquired how far those Acts, within the limited sphere in which they operated, were efficacious in removing or preventing this disease. I will not refer to the ample statements in the Report of the Royal Commissioners which bear upon this point, but I may refer to a document which has recently been laid on the Table of the House, the Report of Captain Harris, the Inspector of Police, with regard to the present position of the question. In the 9th paragraph he says that—

“2,041 common women have been registered during the year, including those re-registered chiefly from the unprotected districts. Of that number, 646, or 32·76 per cent of those examined (1,972) were found to be diseased on their first examination; whilst, 130 only, or 6·54 per cent of those examined (1,989) out of 2,121 women remaining on the register on the 31st December, 1873, were found to be diseased.”

Now, if this Report is trustworthy at all, if it is not a fabricated Report, such testimony is absolutely conclusive as to the fact that the operation of these Acts has had a direct and signal effect upon the existence of disease. [The right hon. Member having stated the substance of Petitions and Memorials laid before the Commission, before it had concluded its sittings, from the principal naval and military towns and garrisons—all “subjected districts”—proceeded.] Now, all these authorities concur in the strongest way in representing to the Government which they addressed and to the Royal Commission the value which they attached to those Acts. They were men who were on the spot, and who were daily engaged in the administration of justice, and in the administration of public institutions for the relief of sickness and disease, and they were clergymen who were engaged in the haunts of vice and misery, in their respective localities; and they all concurred that these Acts had been most beneficial to the health and to the morals and decencies of the towns in which they were in operation. I do not know what testimony you can have more conclusive than that; and I ask the House whether they are prepared, merely upon statements, and upon statistics which have no authenticity, and which are not corroborated by any evidence which has ever been laid before the House, to vote for the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Scarborough, and to entirely sweep away this legislation and substitute nothing in its place. Before I heard the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), I was under the impression that the Report of the Royal Commission had not received the attention that it had deserved. That Report was the result of great labour and of very great thought, and it obtained in its main provisions the concurrence of the Commission. The minority of the Commission were in favour of maintaining the Act of 1866 in its integrity; a smaller minority were desirous of abolishing the system altogether; but the majority, including dignitaries of the Church of England—the Bishop of Carlisle, Canon Gregory, the Vicar of Brighton, and the late Rev. Mr. Maurice—all concurred that these Acts of 1866 should be removed, and that a mitigated system should be substituted for it. So far as the medical testimony was concerned, there can hardly be a doubt that the system of the periodical examination was the most efficacious for the restriction of disease; but, on the other hand, there were many considerations of morality and decency which rendered the majority of the Commission unwilling to recommend it. There were, no doubt, unpleasant exhibitions attending it, and there was something so repulsive in requiring that these unfortunate creatures should once a fortnight be examined, that the majority of the Commission came to the conclusion that the principal benefit of this policy might be maintained, without continuing that extreme proceeding. I was one of those who thought that the policy of the Act of 1864 was prematurely abandoned. It was working well. The women were coming to the hospital. Imprisonment was required only during the time of treatment—a provision which was absolutely essential to the working of any such system with these thoughtless and vicious women; for if they had been allowed to quit the hospital before being cured, the Act would be reduced to nullity. Upon the fourth allegation, that the Acts have been greatly abused, that modest women have been insulted, and that poor creatures who are not offending against public decency have been hunted up by the police, we also made particular inquiry. We had 70 cases of alleged gross misconduct on the part of the police. The Commissioners reported that they investigated these cases, and that there was no evidence in support of them. They invited the persons who had made these charges to come forward with their proofs, and they declined to do so; and the result was, that many of them depended upon mere hearsay, and others were without foundation. That was the result of a strict inquiry. I am so desirous that this policy should not be abandoned in toto, that this House should not adopt a view founded on exaggerated statements with regard to the policy and operation of these Acts, that I should have been glad to have entered very fully into the subject; but the subject has been fairly brought forward before the House by hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me. I say that the Acts are not immoral in their tendency, but that they are efficacious, and have not been abused. We have to deal with a trade, which, though not recognized, is as practically established as if it was a recognized trade. That trade is carried on with conditions dangerous to the public health and offensive to the public order. We apply restrictions and regulations to the manufacture of gunpowder, to the storing of petroleum, and to the management of public-houses. We are told by some enthusiasts that this is an invasion of the liberty of the subject. No doubt. But what sort of liberty—the liberty of prostitution and the liberty of propagating disease. I should be glad to see more legislation to restrain such liberty as that. The question to-day is, whether this policy shall be abandoned or not, or whether we shall adhere to the Acts as they stand? That is the question upon which we have to vote, and I regret it, for the opponents of the Acts are absolutely unpractical, and they reject the recommendations of the Royal Commission with contempt. ["No, no!"] I am so advised. I have never seen one word in the numerous publications of the opponents in favour of any one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission. If these recommendations had been met in a reasonable spirit of compromise I should have been happy to have aided in modifying the Acts. But I have found no such disposition. There is an uncompromising determination to sweep away this policy; and much as I approve of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and entirely as I concur in the speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), I cannot hesitate to give a vote against the Bill introduced by the hon. Baronet.

Mr. Massey

Mr. STANSFELD: Sir, I entreat the House to grant me for a short time a patient hearing. I have some right to be heard on this subject, for I beg leave to say that during the past year probably no hon. Member of this House has devoted so much time and thought to it as I; and I would add that by the course I have taken that I have given pledges of my sincerity as far as my convictions are concerned. Now, Sir, time presses, and I rise under a very considerable disadvantage, because I am under the obligation, which I recognize, of making way in time for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who no doubt will conclude this debate. I do not make this statement for the purpose of obtaining sympathy for my misfortune; but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman when he rises, and I would ask the House to give me this credit at least, not to believe when I have resumed my seat, that I have exhausted all that I would have liked to say on this subject. It will be necessary for me to make a selection, and to confine myself somewhat stringently to certain aspects of the question. Time will not allow me to give, as fully as I could, a reply, which I am not unable to give, to previous speeches in favour of the present system of legislation. Sir, we have been told that the view—the main view—of the opponents of these laws is, that diseases, which are the frequent consequences of sexual vice, are the visitation of Providence, and that Government or law have no right to assuage or cure them. I entirely repudiate such a doctrine, and I take upon myself, having as much knowledge as any man can have of the opinions of the opponents of this legislation, to say that there is no considerable number of persons anywhere who entertain such a doctrine. Our view is something very different. The function of Christian charity is to heal diseases; and, above all, those which are the consequences of vice, because that healing gives the opportunity to reclaim, and therefore those of us who oppose this legislation, are entirely in favour of voluntary hospitals, such as those to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) has referred. But what we object to is this—and the House will, indeed, be dull-sighted if it is unable to grasp this distinction—we approve of hospitals and of reclamatory agencies, but we disapprove of the registering of the examination of women, of the periodical examination, and of the Government guarantee. As for me I am amazed, I say, to find men incapable of understanding this, that when you have a system whose effect—I will not speak of the object in the minds of those who introduced it—that is not the question—that has never been the question as far as I am concerned—but when you have a system, the effect and tendency of which is not to cure and to reclaim, but to cure and regulate in order that these women may be returned sound upon the market, I would ask any sensible man if he can deny, on appealing to his conscience, but that a law of this description must be calculated to lower the moral tone and the habits of the people of this country? I may state further, to define our views and our objects, that we are entirely open to the consideration of any ameliorative measures not subject to the objections to which I have referred—namely, that their effect upon the imagination and the habits and the life of the population would be of a demoralizing nature. But what I desire to do is to address myself to a part of the subject which is very dry, but which has to be expounded to the House, and this I will compress to the narrowest limits, and I earnestly entreat the patient hearing of the House. I have been much struck in the course of this debate, that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General (Mr. Cave), and the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill (Colonel Alexander), appeared not to feel it incumbent upon them to adduce any arguments or statistics to prove the hygienic success of legislation, which rightly or wrongly revolts the moral sense of a large portion of the community. Well, then, Sir, I am here compelled, not to take up the most elevated part of the subject, but to cast everything else upon one side in order that, if the House will give me its attention, I may demonstrate as well as I can the hygienic failure of these Acts and this system, and so prepare the way for Her Majesty's Government, not yet responsible, whatever may be said, as a Government, for this system, to make their proposals to the House at some future time. Well, Sir, I turn, and refer to the Army and Navy

Medical Returns. The question which I have to discuss—the hygienic question—is a double question, and I ask the House to sever those two questions. First, the question and the object of promoting efficiency or diminishing inefficiency in the Army and Navy; and, secondly, the question and the object of greatly diminishing, if not of stamping out, a disease which is said to be a scourge in our population, affecting the innocent and injuring the constitution of generations yet unborn. Well, I will take these propositions in turn; and I undertake first to demonstrate from the existing Army and Navy Returns, and then from the Return of the right hon. Gentleman to which he casually referred, which was circulated amongst hon. Members on Saturday last, and which I presume is intended as a refutation of the conclusion at which I have arrived, the practical failure of these Acts. Sir, the Army Medical Returns divide these diseases—I will use no medical terms—which are the consequence of sexual vice into two classes, which are generally called the less and the more serious class. As to that which is called the less serious class it is admitted—explicitly admitted—by consecutive Army Returns that no reduction in respect of that class of disease has been effected by these Acts. Now, I ask the House to pause for a moment, and consider, from a scientific point of view, the importance of a fact of this kind, of which I have never heard an attempt at an explanation. What is the difference between the two classes of disease, that one should be reduced, and that the other should not be favourably affected by such a system as this of which I am now speaking? I will give you some reason why that first class shows no reduction—first of all by the false expectation of physical immunity from the consequences of vice, you have stimulated vice; and if you stimulate vice you increase the danger and the probability of disease; and, secondly, this particular class of disease, which people are wont to call the less serious, is by no means the less serious as far as the temporary efficiency of soldiers and sailors is concerned; and it is the most difficult to conceal; and those are reasons why no apparent reduction has been effected in the admissions to hospitals in respect of this class of disease, and those reasons do not apply with equal force to the other class. Well, then, I come to the other class. I find in the year 1866—which is the date of the earliest existing Act—that the number of admissions to hospital per 1,000 men in the subjected districts in respect of this second class of disease was 90 per 1,000. We find that by the year 1872 that 90 had fallen to 54. Now, that is a great reduction; and if you look to the unprotected districts, you do not find that fall. And these are the figures which have impressed the minds of the Government, and these are the figures with which it is essential for me to deal. I said that this second class was by no means necessarily the serious class; and now I will prove it. The detentions in hospital in consequence of this second-class disease are for limited periods of time, and the 54 admissions per 1,000 men mean no more according to the Army Returns than a number of constantly sick from that cause of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  men per 1,000. When I go back from 1872 to 1868, I find the admissions have risen from 54 to 72, and I find that the average of constantly sick has only risen from  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to 5. When I go back to the year 1866, I find, as I have said, that the admissions were 90, and by a process of calculation, because I have no means of knowing the exact figure, and my conclusions may not be literally and exactly true as regards that particular year, yet it proves itself true upon a series of years, I say that 90 means no more than  $5\frac{1}{2}$  constantly sick in the 1,000. Therefore the saving in the efficiency of the Army is 1 per 1,000 in 1872 as compared with 1866. The whole Home Army consists of 85,000 men, and 50,000 are now in the subjected districts. I have shown you that the fall in the numbers constantly sick has been from 66 to 72, from  $5\frac{1}{2}$  to  $4\frac{1}{2}$  of men per 1,000, and that is a saving of efficiency of 1 man per 1,000, and that is the saving of 50 men out of a whole Army of 85,000 men. I am responsible for that figure. My right hon. Friend, in referring to that figure, talked of there being an inefficiency of 648, but he did not explain, and I do not understand that figure to refer to his Return. What I find is, that comparing subjected with unsubjected districts, he is disposed, or the Return attempts, to show a saving of 200 instead of about 50. That saving I am prepared to dis-prove; but I am not going to disprove it. I confidently ask the House and the Government whether they are prepared to base legislation upon this subject upon the basis of a hypothetical saving of 50 or even of 200 men who are simply in hospital instead of parade, because I have shown that the bulk of this disease is of a light character. If the order was given, not for parade but for foreign duty, then these hospitals would soon be cleared. Let me come to some other figures, which I will rapidly place before the attention of the Government and the House. As far as the invaliding is concerned, in the year 1866, the number of men invalided from this cause—I am alluding to the second class of disease—was 43, out of a total of 60,000; and in 1872 the 43 had risen to 96, out of a total of 85,000. That is to say, from 7 per 10,000 to 11 per 10,000 men. Sir, as regards the Home Navy nearly everything has gone to the bad. I am about to modify some figures which I have given to the public elsewhere, not that they are inaccurate, but that they are not entirely exhaustive, and the Army and Medical Returns vary in their nomenclature, and the classification of disease has been changed from year to year; but I give them with the changes. Those changes, however, have no bearing whatever upon my argument. In 1866, the admission to hospital, in respect of this disease, out of our naval forces, was 101·5 per 1,000 men; in 1872, 131·8 per 1,000 men; the constantly sick, and therefore inefficient, numbered in 1866 9·3 per 1,000, and in 1872, 10 per 1,000; in 1866, out of a total Home naval force of 21,200, 22 were invalided; in 1872, out of 23,000, the number of permanently invalided had risen from 22 to 52 men. Well, then, Sir, if the House will grant me attention, I will come to the Return which has been laid upon the Table. We have been asked to believe everything that Government tells us, and I have been told that it is a reflection upon the Captain Harrises, or whoever they may be, if we do not believe this Return. But I am somewhat familiar with Government departments and Government Returns, and it is no reflection upon the officers who made those Returns to say what I am going to say—that when a given policy is impugned, and you call upon the Department for statistics or Returns which are to enable you to meet objections of that description, that their function becomes somewhat one of advocacy; and without any conscious dishonesty at all, they are apt so to deal with those figures, or to manipulate them so as to present to us the view which a priori they have adopted in their own minds. This is not only argument; I will prove that I am right. Well, now, what the Return tries to show is this—In order to show a heavy fall in respect of this second class of disease in the protected places, it goes back for six years before the Act of 1866, and takes an average of four years before the Act of 1864. Now, there was a constant fall before the Acts, and therefore not caused by the Acts. It may be said that it was in consequence of the reduction of the Army, but I will meet that objection. For the present it is enough to say that instead of starting from the natural starting point, the beginning of a particular system of legislation, you go back to a prior date in order to get a higher starting point. You pursue a course which, statistically, is not to be justified. The fall is calculated upon from an average of 130 to an average of 87. The average of 87 is the average of six years, from 1864 to 1869; that figure is reached in 1866. I will show to the House that whether that fall from 130 to 87 is an accurate or exaggerated statement; there is not 1 per cent of that fall due to the operation of the Acts, and I will show that, as I was never able to show it before, from this Army Paper, and the Army and Medical Returns of 1872. In this Return, I find in 1866, in places which ultimately came under the Acts, out of 39,476 men, the number of admissions amongst men for this second class of disease was 87. That is the fall from 130 to 87; but if I turn to the Army Medical Report of 1872, I get more information—the proportion of those 39,000 men, who at that time were under the Acts; and I get the fall in respect of these men, and what I find is this—that of these 39,476 men, only 10,161 were under the protection of the Acts; and whereas on the whole, the fall had been from 130 to 87, with reference to these 10,161 protected men, the fall was simply 90·5. And therefore I maintain that so far as the 87 per 1,000 is concerned, it is in no degree owing to the operation of the Acts, because as to the 10,000 men subjected to the Acts in these districts, the fall is only to 90½, and the fall to 87 was only obtained by taking into account what occurred amongst the 29,000 men who happened to be unprotected men. Then, passing over another point, I come to the last statement in the Return, which is to this effect, which is an admission that does credit to the reporters, but which does not consort with the hon. and gallant Gentleman's remarks who referred to them. He referred to the great reduction in the year 1874 as a favourable fact, as far as these Acts were concerned; and he referred to Lord Cardwell's Order as a blessing to the Army, and as something which acted as a deterrent against vice. Now, this Report does not support that view. For I find these words—

“In October, 1873, a Royal Warrant was promulgated, directing that soldiers admitted into hospital on account of venereal diseases should forfeit their pay whilst under treatment. It is presumed that this led to concealment of those diseases.”

So that you do not get a real Return, but a concealment of the disease; and the statistics after 1873 become and are henceforth simply valueless. But I will give some evidence. I was down at Portsmouth the other day, and I will tell you what I heard at Portsmouth. A short time ago three regiments were suddenly examined. In one of those regiments they found 40 cases of concealed disease. And I will tell the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) what the soldiers of Portsmouth say with regard to that Order of Lord Cardwell, for which they were to be so thankful. Well, they might be thankful for that Order if it were not for the existence of this legislation; but it is not consistent with the principle of this legislation, and I know what the soldiers say. They say—“You only permit a small portion of us to be married, and for the rest you provide these women, and you guarantee that they shall be clean, and then you fine us, and stop our pay, not because we were vicious, but because we have not been safe in our intercourse with the women you have provided.” They say it is not fair, and I say it is not fair and consistent with the principle of these Acts. I will be true to my word, and will compress my remarks as much as possible. I will now come to another branch of the subject, and that is the severity of the disease, and its effect upon future generations. Now, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has moved the rejection of this Bill has quoted the medical testimony of Mr. Lane, and has felt himself justified in speaking slightly of Mr. Simon, and preferred the opinions of a specialist like Mr. Lane; but I am not so easily persuaded to pin my faith to specialists, and Mr. Simon's opinion of the gross exaggerations employed in speaking of the severity and danger of transmission of this class has been confirmed by the evidence of Mr. Skey before the Committee of the House of Lords, and by the opinion of Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson, probably the highest authority on the subject in the country, and others. But whatever the danger may be as to its severity or the danger of its transmission, this at least is true, that your legislation has had no effect whatever upon that particular class of disease. The second class of disease to which reference has been made is not this most serious class, but contains it in some small fraction; and when I want to know the practical effect and judge from the Government Returns, I find in the year 1866, as to this most serious class—which is known by the repetition of the attack without fresh contact—that whereas in 1866 the admissions to hospital came to 24·73 per cent, in 1872 they came to 24·26, which is the same thing within a decimal fraction. Well then, Sir, I say these figures cannot be disproved; I say these figures must banish for ever the notion of the great hygienic success of the measure, and it can only reappear as a vague picture on the hypothesis of the adoption of further and more stringent laws of continental origin to which this country will never submit. Therefore I will simply make this appeal to the Government and the House, if we have lost sight of the possibility of the large hygienic success which recommended it to the consideration of the House, I will ask the House, in the interest of morality and justice, and in deference to the moral instincts of large portions of the community, and further in the interest of the character of Government, of Parliament, and of Law, let us determine, by the repeal of these Acts, that at least Parliament and Government and Law shall no longer be needlessly responsible for legislation which has outraged, without any occasion, the moral instincts of a large portion of the community, which has raised an agitation which will never cease until it has attained its object, and which, if you will address the question to your own consciences, they will tell you is essentially immoral, and incapable of justification or defence.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I am quite unable to bring into the course which I shall think it my duty to adopt on the discussion of this subject any of the passion or enthusiasm which has been adopted by the right hon. Gentleman who has preceded me; and, if I, dealing as I do with the responsibility of the Army, feel myself obliged to take part in the debate, I do so with reluctance, for it is a subject which in itself is distasteful to me, and which, I know, excites the feelings described in large classes of the community. But I speak with a deep sense of the benefits achieved from the operation of these Acts, and the responsibility incurred if I were to withdraw that protection from the Army by giving a negative to the Amendment on the Motion before the House. The passion which has been thrown into the discussion by the right hon. Gentleman, not only in this House but elsewhere, while it does great credit to his sincerity, is not so creditable to his judgment. I was sorry to read in this pamphlet—that elsewhere he said that where laws are passed without preliminary discussion they are not entitled to the obedience of the public. [MR. STANSFELD: I beg your pardon; I never said so.] I will read the passage to which I allude, which is contained in this pamphlet published by the Association of which the right hon. Gentleman is the head—

“Acts that have been passed without the sanction of public opinion, and without that preliminary discussion which the laws of Parliament are intended to receive, have no rightful claim upon our obedience.”

MR. STANSFELD: I cannot undertake to remember my precise words. [“Oh, oh!”] I have always been perfectly frank with the House. What I can remember is their intent and effect, which was, that laws passed in the manner I described, had forfeited all claim upon our moral obedience. [“Oh, oh!”] their grace? I implore these ladies, if they are opposed to these Acts—if they think it right to agitate this question—that they will, at all events, leave our children in peace, and not pollute their minds by issuing any more of this literature.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 145.)

(The Lord Henniker.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HENNIKER said, that, as this measure had been fully discussed in the House of Commons, and had been agreed upon by a Select Committee, after taking evidence on the subject, he should say but a few words in moving that the Bill be now read the second time. Its object was to remedy a hardship which now existed. Under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, sec. 163, it was provided that any sewers rate raised under that Act, should as regarded arable and pasture land, market gardens, nursery grounds, &c., be levied in the proportion of one fourth part only of the net annual value—that was to say, they were exempt from 75 per cent of the burden that fell upon other descriptions of property. The Metropolitan Board of Works issued their precepts in a lump sum, based on the printed totals of the valuation lists of the several districts. The districts were bound to make up this sum; but, as they were bound to respect the exemptions of this description of property, the only way they could make up the sum was by levying an increased rate on householders. The hardship was that exempt property did not exist in more than one-half of the metropolitan parishes, but where it did exist was generally in the poorer districts, and the small householders were the sufferers. If the extra rate were taken all over the metropolis—that was to say, if the proposal of this Bill were adopted and the Metropolitan Board of Works were compelled to issue their precepts, with the allowance or abatement of the exemptions where they existed, then the burden would be very light indeed—hardly perceptible—whereas the burden was heavy now, coming as it did upon single districts, and generally upon poor ones. To take a case to illustrate the matter. St. George's, Hanover Square, say, would have very little to complain of; while Plumstead, the district where there was most land and exempt property, would have a great deal to complain of. The one had hardly any, if any, exempt property, and was a rich parish; while the other, getting much less advantage from the action of the Metropolitan Board of Works, had this exempt property, and the householders were nearly all poor. The Metropolitan Board of Works issued a precept for £10,000, say, to each parish; the one which had no exempt property from a magistrate at Chichester, detailing a case that has come within his own observation [and the right hon. Gentleman read it to the House.] Can it fairly said that we are doing an un-Christian act, in taking these girls into an hospital where they will have the attention of chaplains and matrons; and rescue the girl from a life probably caused by the neglect of parents in her early years, and endeavour to provide for her, as hundreds have been provided for, and redeemed from this horrible life. I cannot now go into details with respect to compulsory examination and registry. It is not the time to discuss these questions, we are now asked to pass a Bill which proposes the total and absolute repeal of these Acts, leaving nothing in their place to check the spread of this fatal disease. But I would have the House remember what has been done in the way of prevention and cure. I mean the moral cure as distinguished from the physical one. I have before me an extract from the report of the chaplain of the Lock Hospital at Cork; and I shall call upon the Irish Members to vote as I vote, after they have heard the extract. It has been said, no provision is made for the moral treatment of these people; this is totally untrue. No hospital for the treatment of the disease would be sanctioned unless it had proper provision for the moral treatment of the patients. A clause to the effect on the Motion of Mr. Ayrton was introduced into one of the Acts, that the certificate should be withdrawn unless the hospital was so provided. This condition has been observed, and it shows that the moral training has been in the minds of those who were considering their physical cure. The chaplain to whom I referred, gives most accurate details, and has been in correspondence with the women. He says, out of those received into the hospital, 5 were sent back to their fathers; 11 were sent back to their mothers; 5 were sent back to brothers and sisters; 2 went back to their husbands; 10 were provided with situations; 12 were sent to the Union, where they were behaving properly; 22 had died after giving very sincere proof of their having renounced their evil life, 9 had emigrated, 13 had married, and 56 were in Magdalen Hospitals. Of others the Returns were not so favourable, but only 25 the chaplain considered to have relapsed. These Acts have in their necessity that which is repulsive to many of us. I can say when they were first introduced, my instincts were against them. It is only upon the distinct feeling and the assurance I derive that they are operating physically and morally to the advantage of all, that I can give them the support which I do. I might, but for the lateness of the hour, quote Returns of a similar character that I have received from Chatham and many other places. The hon. Member for Stockport made a complaint because a policeman told a married woman going into a certain house that it was a brothel. That was complained of as being an interference with personal liberty, and yet the woman went the next day and thanked the police inspector for the warning she had received. It can be shown that many girls are prevented from entering into this trade. Formerly, girls of 12 years of age were commonly seen about the streets of some towns—they are now hardly ever seen—thus proving that these Acts exercise a most beneficial preventive influence. Since I came into the House I have received a letter from a Dissenting minister at Woolwich, who confirms all that has been said by the Roman Catholic Chaplain of the great importance at Cork of the Acts in their social aspects, and the beneficial result upon the whole population. Much has been said of the agitation of which the right hon. Gentleman has put himself at the head. I do not wish to say one word against the ladies who have devoted themselves with pain and reluctance to the work of repealing these Acts, if they think it their duty to do so; but I will ask one question of them: If you are so strongly convinced of the degradation which you say is imposed by these Acts upon the polluted and degraded, what do you think must be the effect of putting into the hands of young girls the horrible literature which has been circulated in connection with this agitation? Has not that literature been doing something towards polluting the minds of young girls who lived in ignorance of these things, and who ought to be allowed to live in ignorance of such matters, and to grow up in that innocence and that purity which is their beauty and the former. The Canadian publishers could not get a sale for such expensive editions of new books as those produced in England; and accordingly they were driven to the pirated editions. Copyright was a difficult subject to deal with even at home, but when in addition to the English author and the English publisher, the colonial publisher had to be considered, the question became much more complicated. He had said that the ad valorem duty plan had failed. It was not difficult to see the reason why. There were some 200 or 300 frontier stations on the line of boundary between the United States and Canada; but there were several thousands of miles of boundary. Their Lordships might imagine then the difficulties of supervision to enforce the payment of duty on the reprints brought into Canada. The necessity for the Colonies of cheaper editions of new works than those published in England must be admitted. He believed that long ago Lord Macaulay and Sir Charles Trevelyan thought it necessary to sanction the introduction of these reprints into India. The fact was that a different system of copyright was required for Canada from that which existed in this country. The Parliament of Canada took that view, and had given effect to it in an Act, which if the Imperial Parliament passed the Bill now before their Lordships he would be able to advise Her Majesty to sanction by Order in Council. Without this Bill he could not do so, for a reason which he would presently explain. The Bill did two things. In the first place, it affirmed the principle that copyright in England should carry copyright in Canada. It would make the owner of an English copyright secure of a copyright for 28 years in Canada; but it did so on one condition—that the work should be printed and published, or reprinted and republished, and registered in Canada. The Bill further provided that Canadian reprints of English copyright books should not be allowed to re-enter England. The principle of the latter provision was not a new one. The existing law prohibited an entry to reprints, and it would be impossible to obtain the assent of English publishers to a Bill of this kind if they were not to be protected from cheap reprints which would be imported into this country for the purpose of underselling their own editions. The reason why he was unable to advise the Crown to sanction the Act passed by the Canadian Legislature without this Bill was, that sanction could not be given by Order in Council to any Colonial Bill which was repugnant to an Imperial statute. Now, as the Imperial Act of 1847 allowed the importation of foreign reprints on payment of a certain duty, the recent Act of the Canadian Parliament was in form repugnant to it. The plan which would be sanctioned if this Bill became law was a compromise. He believed it was a reasonable one, and that most authors and publishers would avail themselves of it. Those who did not wish to do so would keep themselves under the existing law and take their chance of what they might receive under the 12½ ad valorem duty. His noble Friend the late Foreign Secretary had found it was a very complicated and arduous task to deal with this question of copyright in the Colonies, and last year he himself felt obliged to advise the Crown to refuse assent to a Colonial Act on this subject which was repugnant to Imperial law. The Act to which he now wished to see the assent of the Crown given was, as he had already explained, repugnant to a provision in an Imperial statute; but the repugnancy was only technical, and he thought it would be much to be lamented if Parliament should not accede to the proposals in the Bill now before their Lordships, though it only dealt with one part of the subject. He might state that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to issue a Royal Commission to deal with all the questions in connection with the subject. He believed, therefore, that this Bill would facilitate a settlement of the subject and bring about much larger results than for the present could be accomplished by the action of the Canadian Legislature.

—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

EARL STANHOPE said, it was now more than 33 years since—in 1842—he introduced a Bill on the subject of copyright. That Bill was not exactly passed in the form in which he first had framed it, but received Amendments suggested in part by Lord Macaulay and in part by Sir Robert Peel. Thus improved he believed he might say that it had worked well and given satisfaction to all parties do so; and the result was, that many of them depended upon mere hearsay, and others were without foundation. That was the result of a strict inquiry. I am so desirous that this policy should not be abandoned in toto, that this House should not adopt a view founded on exaggerated statements with regard to the policy and operation of these Acts, that I should have been glad to have entered very fully into the subject; but the subject has been fairly brought forward before the House by hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me. I say that the Acts are not immoral in their tendency, but that they are efficacious, and have not been abused. We have to deal with a trade, which, though not recognized, is as practically established as if it was a recognized trade. That trade is carried on with conditions dangerous to the public health and offensive to the public order. We apply restrictions and regulations to the manufacture of gunpowder, to the storing of petroleum, and to the management of public-houses. We are told by some enthusiasts that this is an invasion of the liberty of the subject. No doubt. But what sort of liberty—the liberty of prostitution and the liberty of propagating disease. I should be glad to see more legislation to restrain such liberty as that. The question today is, whether this policy shall be abandoned or not, or whether we shall adhere to the Acts as they stand? That is the question upon which we have to vote, and I regret it, for the opponents of the Acts are absolutely impractical, and they reject the recommendations of the Royal Commission with contempt. ["No, no!"] I am so advised. I have never seen one word in the numerous publications of the opponents in favour of any one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission. If these recommendations had been met in a reasonable spirit of compromise I should have been happy to have aided in modifying the Acts. But I have found no such disposition. There is an uncompromising determination to sweep away this policy; and much as I approve of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and entirely as I concur in the speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), I cannot hesitate to give a vote against the Bill introduced by the hon. Baronet.

MR. STANSFELD: Sir, I entreat the House to grant me for a short time a patient hearing. I have some right to be heard on this subject, for I beg leave to say that during the past year probably no hon. Member of this House has devoted so much time and thought to it as I; and I would add that by the course I have taken that I have given pledges of my sincerity as far as my convictions are concerned. Now, Sir, time presses, and I rise under a very considerable disadvantage, because I am under the obligation, which I recognize, of making way in time for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who no doubt will conclude this debate. I do not make this statement for the purpose of obtaining sympathy for my misfortune; but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman when he rises, and I would ask the House to give me this credit at least, not to believe when I have resumed my seat, that I have exhausted all that I would have liked to say on this subject. It will be necessary for me to make a selection, and to confine myself somewhat stringently to certain aspects of the question. Time will not allow me to give, as fully as I could, a reply, which I am not unable to give, to previous speeches in favour of the present system of legislation. Sir, we have been told that the view—the main view—of the opponents of these laws is, that diseases, which are the frequent consequences of sexual vice, are the visitation of Providence, and that Government or law have no right to assuage or cure them. I entirely repudiate such a doctrine, and I take upon myself, having as much knowledge as any man can have of the opinions of the opponents of this legislation, to say that there is no considerable number of persons anywhere who entertain such a doctrine. Our view is something very different. The function of Christian charity is to heal diseases; and, above all, those which are the consequences of vice, because that healing gives the opportunity to reclaim, and therefore those of us who oppose this legislation, are entirely in favour of voluntary hospitals, such as those to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) has referred. But what we object to is this—and the House will, indeed, be dull-sighted if it is unable to grasp this distinction—we approve of hospitals and of reclamationary agencies, but we disapprove of the registering of the examination of women, of the periodical examination, and of the Government guarantee. As for me I am amazed, I say, to find men incapable of understanding this, that when you have a system whose effect—I will not speak of the object in the minds of those who introduced it—that is not the question—that has never been the question as far as I am concerned—but when you have a system, the effect and tendency of which is not to cure and to reclaim, but to cure and regulate in order that these women may be returned sound upon the market, I would ask any sensible man if he can deny, on appealing to his conscience, but that a law of this description must be calculated to lower the moral tone and the habits of the people of this country? I may state further, to define our views and our objects, that we are entirely open to the consideration of any ameliorative measures not subject to the objections to which I have referred—namely, that their effect upon the imagination and the habits and the life of the population would be of a demoralizing nature. But what I desire to do is to address myself to a part of the subject which is very dry, but which has to be expounded to the House, and this I will compress to the narrowest limits, and I earnestly entreat the patient hearing of the House. I have been much struck in the course of this debate, that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General (Mr. Cave), and the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill (Colonel Alexander), appeared not to feel it incumbent upon them to adduce any arguments or statistics to prove the hygienic success of legislation, which rightly or wrongly revolts the moral sense of a large portion of the community. Well, then, Sir, I am here compelled, not to take up the most elevated part of the subject, but to cast everything else upon one side in order that, if the House will give me its attention, I may demonstrate as well as I can the hygienic failure of these Acts and this system, and so prepare the way for Her Majesty's Government, not yet responsible, whatever may be said, as a Government, for this system, to make their proposals to the House at some future time. Well, Sir, I turn, and refer to the Army and Navy

Medical Returns. The question which I have to discuss—the hygienic question—is a double question, and I ask the House to sever those two questions. First, the question and the object of promoting efficiency or diminishing inefficiency in the Army and Navy; and, secondly, the question and the object of greatly diminishing, if not of stamping out, a disease which is said to be a scourge in our population, affecting the innocent and injuring the constitution of generations yet unborn. Well, I will take these propositions in turn; and I undertake first to demonstrate from the existing Army and Navy Returns, and then from the Return of the right hon. Gentleman to which he casually referred, which was circulated amongst hon. Members on Saturday last, and which I presume is intended as a refutation of the conclusion at which I have arrived, the practical failure of these Acts. Sir, the Army Medical Returns divide these diseases—I will use no medical terms—which are the consequence of sexual vice into two classes, which are generally called the less and the more serious class. As to that which is called the less serious class it is admitted—explicitly admitted—by consecutive Army Returns that no reduction in respect of that class of disease has been effected by these Acts. Now, I ask the House to pause for a moment, and consider, from a scientific point of view, the importance of a fact of this kind, of which I have never heard an attempt at an explanation. What is the difference between the two classes of disease, that one should be reduced, and that the other should not be favourably affected by such a system as this of which I am now speaking? I will give you some reason why that first class shows no reduction—first of all by the false expectation of physical immunity from the consequences of vice, you have stimulated vice; and if you stimulate vice you increase the danger and the probability of disease; and, secondly, this particular class of disease, which people are wont to call the less serious, is by no means the less serious as far as the temporary efficiency of soldiers and sailors is concerned; and it is the most difficult to conceal; and those are reasons why no apparent reduction has been effected in the admissions to hospitals in respect of this class of disease, and those reasons do so; and the result was, that many of them depended upon mere hearsay, and others were without foundation. That was the result of a strict inquiry. I am so desirous that this policy should not be abandoned in toto, that this House should not adopt a view founded on exaggerated statements with regard to the policy and operation of these Acts, that I should have been glad to have entered very fully into the subject; but the subject has been fairly brought forward before the House by hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me. I say that the Acts are not immoral in their tendency, but that they are efficacious, and have not been abused. We have to deal with a trade, which, though not recognized, is as practically established as if it was a recognized trade. That trade is carried on with conditions dangerous to the public health and offensive to the public order. We apply restrictions and regulations to the manufacture of gunpowder, to the storing of petroleum, and to the management of public-houses. We are told by some enthusiasts that this is an invasion of the liberty of the subject. No doubt. But what sort of liberty—the liberty of prostitution and the liberty of propagating disease. I should be glad to see more legislation to restrain such liberty as that. The question to-day is, whether this policy shall be abandoned or not, or whether we shall adhere to the Acts as they stand? That is the question upon which we have to vote, and I regret it, for the opponents of the Acts are absolutely unpractical, and they reject the recommendations of the Royal Commission with contempt. ["No, no!"] I am so advised. I have never seen one word in the numerous publications of the opponents in favour of any one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission. If these recommendations had been met in a reasonable spirit of compromise I should have been happy to have aided in modifying the Acts. But I have found no such disposition. There is an uncompromising determination to sweep away this policy; and much as I approve of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and entirely as I concur in the speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), I cannot hesitate to give a vote against the Bill introduced by the hon. Baronet.

MR. STANSFELD: Sir, I entreat the House to grant me for a short time a patient hearing. I have some right to be heard on this subject, for I beg leave to say that during the past year probably no hon. Member of this House has devoted so much time and thought to it as I; and I would add that by the course I have taken that I have given pledges of my sincerity as far as my convictions are concerned. Now, Sir, time presses, and I rise under a very considerable disadvantage, because I am under the obligation, which I recognize, of making way in time for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who no doubt will conclude this debate. I do not make this statement for the purpose of obtaining sympathy for my misfortune; but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman when he rises, and I would ask the House to give me this credit at least, not to believe when I have resumed my seat, that I have exhausted all that I would have liked to say on this subject. It will be necessary for me to make a selection, and to confine myself somewhat stringently to certain aspects of the question. Time will not allow me to give, as fully as I could, a reply, which I am not unable to give, to previous speeches in favour of the present system of legislation. Sir, we have been told that the view—the main view—of the opponents of these laws is, that diseases, which are the frequent consequences of sexual vice, are the visitation of Providence, and that Government or law have no right to assuage or cure them. I entirely repudiate such a doctrine, and I take upon myself, having as much knowledge as any man can have of the opinions of the opponents of this legislation, to say that there is no considerable number of persons anywhere who entertain such a doctrine. Our view is something very different. The function of Christian charity is to heal diseases; and, above all, those which are the consequences of vice, because that healing gives the opportunity to reclaim, and therefore those of us who oppose this legislation, are entirely in favour of voluntary hospitals, such as those to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) has referred. But what we object to is this—and the House will, indeed, be dull-sighted if it is unable to grasp this distinction—we approve of hospitals and of reclamationary agencies, but we disapprove of the registering of the examination of women, of the periodical examination, and of the Government guarantee. As for me I am amazed, I say, to find men incapable of understanding this, that when you have a system whose effect—I will not speak of the object in the minds of those who introduced it—that is not the question—that has never been the question as far as I am concerned—but when you have a system, the effect and tendency of which is not to cure and to reclaim, but to cure and regulate in order that these women may be returned sound upon the market, I would ask any sensible man if he can deny, on appealing to his conscience, but that a law of this description must be calculated to lower the moral tone and the habits of the people of this country? I may state further, to define our views and our objects, that we are entirely open to the consideration of any ameliorative measures not subject to the objections to which I have referred—namely, that their effect upon the imagination and the habits and the life of the population would be of a demoralizing nature. But what I desire to do is to address myself to a part of the subject which is very dry, but which has to be expounded to the House, and this I will compress to the narrowest limits, and I earnestly entreat the patient hearing of the House. I have been much struck in the course of this debate, that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General (Mr. Cave), and the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill (Colonel Alexander), appeared not to feel it incumbent upon them to adduce any arguments or statistics to prove the hygienic success of legislation, which rightly or wrongly revolts the moral sense of a large portion of the community. Well, then, Sir, I am here compelled, not to take up the most elevated part of the subject, but to cast everything else upon one side in order that, if the House will give me its attention, I may demonstrate as well as I can the hygienic failure of these Acts and this system, and so prepare the way for Her Majesty's Government, not yet responsible, whatever may be said, as a Government, for this system, to make their proposals to the House at some future time. Well, Sir, I turn, and refer to the Army and Navy

Medical Returns. The question which I have to discuss—the hygienic question—is a double question, and I ask the House to sever those two questions. First, the question and the object of promoting efficiency or diminishing inefficiency in the Army and Navy; and, secondly, the question and the object of greatly diminishing, if not of stamping out, a disease which is said to be a scourge in our population, affecting the innocent and injuring the constitution of generations yet unborn. Well, I will take these propositions in turn; and I undertake first to demonstrate from the existing Army and Navy Returns, and then from the Return of the right hon. Gentleman to which he casually referred, which was circulated amongst hon. Members on Saturday last, and which I presume is intended as a refutation of the conclusion at which I have arrived, the practical failure of these Acts. Sir, the Army Medical Returns divide these diseases—I will use no medical terms—which are the consequence of sexual vice into two classes, which are generally called the less and the more serious class. As to that which is called the less serious class it is admitted—explicitly admitted—by consecutive Army Returns that no reduction in respect of that class of disease has been effected by these Acts. Now, I ask the House to pause for a moment, and consider, from a scientific point of view, the importance of a fact of this kind, of which I have never heard an attempt at an explanation. What is the difference between the two classes of disease, that one should be reduced, and that the other should not be favourably affected by such a system as this of which I am now speaking? I will give you some reason why that first class shows no reduction—first of all by the false expectation of physical immunity from the consequences of vice, you have stimulated vice; and if you stimulate vice you increase the danger and the probability of disease; and, secondly, this particular class of disease, which people are wont to call the less serious, is by no means the less serious as far as the temporary efficiency of soldiers and sailors is concerned; and it is the most difficult to conceal; and those are reasons why no apparent reduction has been effected in the admissions to hospitals in respect of this class of disease, and those reasons in England. But in our Colonial Empire the case had been otherwise. He concurred with his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) that for a growing Colony new works must be produced in a cheaper form than that in which they were usually published in this country; and he also concurred with him as to the disadvantage at which the Canadian publisher was placed by the "advance sheets" of English works which the United States' publisher was able to secure. An international Copyright Act with the United States was most desirable, otherwise it was impossible that the English law could be long allowed to continue in its present state; for while we allowed an American citizen to acquire an English copyright for his books first published here, the like privilege was denied by American law to an English subject publishing his books in America. For instance, Mr. Motley—a name to be mentioned with all respect, and with wishes for the recovery of his health—enjoyed an English copyright for his books published in England; but when Captain Marryatt, although the son of an American lady, applied for the same right for his works in the United States it was denied him on the ground that only an American citizen could acquire a copyright in America. He thought Her Majesty's Government deserved thanks for the Bill introduced by his noble Friend.

LORD LISGAR thought the success of the Bill depended on the single question whether the publishers of Canada would be able to reprint editions of English works as cheap as the United States' publishers could print pirated edition of these works. He was afraid they would not find it worth their while to enter into the competition. The experiment of the new Act and of the Bill before their Lordships was, however, a laudable one, and he wished it success.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he considered this a very laudable attempt to put this matter on a better footing, and he had greater hopes of the Act succeeding than his noble Friend (Lord Lisgar) seemed to have. The Government of the United States were able to carry out a good copyright all over that large country; and that being so, he did not see why the plan to which this Bill would give effect could not be carried out in Canada. As having taken some part in the negotiations respecting copyright between Canada and this country, he was happy to bear testimony to the good feeling with which they had been conducted on both sides. He hoped those who took an interest in the intellectual advancement of Canada would find their desires promoted by the present legislation.

Earl Stanhope

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY admitted that during the time he was at the Colonial Office no progress was made with this copyright question, and was glad to find his noble Friend had found himself in a position to bring this measure before Parliament. He was afraid that what had been suggested by the noble Lord who had been Governor General of Canada (Lord Lisgar) would turn out to be well founded—he feared that the difficulties in the way of the successful operation of the Act were not so much theoretical as practical. He was afraid that the Canadian Parliament would attempt to do something beyond their power if they endeavoured throughout their long American frontier to shut out the cheap editions published in America. However, as this Bill was in the interest of English authors, he should support it. The Bill was in principle right, and he hoped it would effect the object sought to be attained.

Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL.

(No. 81.) (The Marquess of Salisbury.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the Bill had been kept on the Order Book of the House for a period considerably longer than was originally intended. That was due partly to the fact that ever since the second reading an unfailling stream of deputations had occupied his attention, and had only now terminated. He had had no idea until very recently that the measure could have excited so deep and lively an interest amongst such various classes of persons. Another reason which had induced him to delay proceeding with the Bill in Committee was that he was which it was impossible for Government to deal, but he believed it to be necessary to secure the co-operation of the local authorities and the manufacturers. The ratepayers of a locality had a great interest in the question; and as the law now stood while you forbade the pollution of streams by pouring sewage into them, you allowed manufacturers to discharge their refuse into them. He was most anxious that something should be done, and thought that a comprehensive scheme which would be acceptable to all parties might be introduced next Session. As to the present Bill, he found it, even with the proposed Amendments, open to many objections.

LORD SELBORNE disapproved the proposal to cast upon the County Courts the duty of adjudicating upon sewage cases; this did not come within the proper business of these Courts, and could not, in his opinion, be effectually dealt with by them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the objection of the noble and learned Lord was perfectly just, and was one of the causes that had led to the Amendment of the Bill; and that in its amended form it would probably be found satisfactory in the respect referred to.

EARL GRANVILLE thought the noble Marquess had done right in giving up the attempt to pass the Bill in its present shape through both Houses of Parliament this Session. He agreed with his noble Friend (Lord Aberdare), that though it was only intended to give up one portion of the Bill, it was better to postpone the whole subject to next Session, especially considering the clause that the shortened was very liable to be cut short when it got to the other House. He would suggest that before the measure was reprinted the Amendments should be carefully reconsidered, in order that the passing of it by that House might not be followed—as was sometimes the case—by abandonment immediately afterwards in “another place.”

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he certainly could not guarantee that the Bill would pass through the other House, even were it made much shorter. It was proposed that no sewage offence should arise under the Bill till after the end of 1876.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next, and to be printed as amended. (No. 169.)

PUBLIC RECORDS (IRELAND) ACT, 1867, AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Public Records (Ireland) Act, 1867, and to make provision for keeping safely Parochial Records in Ireland—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1st. (No. 168.)

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MOORE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he is aware that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have intimated their intention of closing the Gormans-town Model Agricultural School, county Tipperary, and disposing of their interest in the land and premises, thereby withdrawing the annual Government Grant to the school, and depriving that part of the county of the great advantages of agricultural education?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland had determined upon selling the farm connected with the school referred to by the hon. and gallant Member, for the loudly against any compulsory use of the sewers which belonged to them, because dangerous gases would, he was informed, be generated, which would force their way back into the houses. As the purification must be not individual but collective, it was obvious that the duty must be thrown on the locality as a whole. It was as a body that the manufacturers created the evil, and as a body they must correct it; and they could only correct it by means of special sewers, which would carry the pollution to some distant place where its ill-effects would not be felt. But that was not the only difficulty. In some places the dye-works obtained their water from waterworks or wells; and that was water to which the riparian owner had no right, and of which they might lawfully deprive him; they might take it and conduct it away and no harm would be done. But in many cases the water was obtained from the river itself; and if they took it away by artesian drainage the consequences would be that the riparian owners lower down who wanted the water for their steam engines, would be seriously injured. The result was that any effort to correct the terrible pollution of rivers in manufacturing towns could only be made effectual by means of a scheme for each river, to be carried out by some authority on which they should place an obligation like that imposed some years ago on the Metropolitan Board of Works, which was charged with the duty of providing for the general purification of the River Thames. What that authority should be—whether it should be a local Conservancy Board or some other body—was not a matter to be decided now, but might well be left for future discussion. Their Lordships, he thought, would unanimously agree in the proposition that the provisions required for vesting in any such authority the necessary powers for fulfilling that task would be so large and so complicated that the attempt to carry them through the House of Commons at the present time would be impracticable. He therefore proposed to defer that portion of this legislation until next year. He proposed, however, to provide that where the pollution from manufactories came by a channel by which it did not come at the beginning of this year, it should be unlawful; so that they might start from this year and declare that there should be no further pollution of rivers. If so simple a provision had been passed 10 or 20 years ago, much of that evil would have been prevented. It was very desirable, therefore, that Parliament should arrest the further growth of that pollution of rivers until it could adopt some general scheme for each drainage area. They did not want by the present Bill to lay down, or even to hint, that those who were now polluting rivers were at liberty to go on doing so for ever. On the contrary, this was only a necessarily imperfect portion of a scheme, and they did not wish that any Minister who might in future take up that question should be told that it had been previously all settled, and that he must meet the claims of vested interests. As a matter of English he despaired of being able to define a "stream," and therefore he thought it better to say that no stream should be included in the Bill which was not ex nomine proclaimed for that purpose by the Local Government Board. That would afford a security that the measure would not be applied for frivolous ends or objects of annoyance. He thought the County Court was capable of dealing with questions as to sewage, and he proposed to insert a clause giving an appeal to the Superior Courts at Westminster. These were the chief points as to which it had been necessary to change the measure. He trusted that those provisions, or some of them at least, might be fortunate enough to obtain the assent of Parliament this year, for he felt certain that any diminution of the present evil, however small, would be beneficial to the public.

Moved, That the House do now go into Committee on the said Bill.—(The Marquess of Salisbury).

LORD ABERDARE said, he saw no reason why they should not adopt the suggestion of the noble Marquess, so far as dealing with solid matter was concerned; and he therefore heartily supported him on that part of the Bill. But when they came to the question of sewage, he saw not only difficulty, but formidable objection to what was now proposed. It must be remembered that it was not always possible to remove sewage except by the aid of steam. He did not think the subject was one with metropolitan Police soon after an official inquiry had been held into the loss or theft of a considerable sum of money by some one of the employés in that office; whether it is true that the Local Government Board have declared to the guardians that—

“They have acquainted themselves as far as they were able to do with the progress and result of that inquiry so far as it affected the official conduct of Mr. Browne, and they do not think that the facts elicited implicated Mr. Browne in regard to the lost money, or affected his character for integrity;”

and that the Local Government Board have accordingly approved his appointment to an office of trust and responsibility in the collection and custody of public moneys; whether it is true that inquiries on this subject addressed to the Commissioners of Metropolitan Police by the Local Government Board were not replied to; and, whether the Commissioners of Police or any other Government department withheld from the Local Government Board any information affecting Mr. Browne's character for integrity, or that would show him to be unfit to have the collection and custody of public moneys?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in reply, said, he believed the Irish Local Government Board had approved of the appointment of Mr. J. A. Browne to the office of collector of public rates, to which he had been elected by the guardians of the North Dublin Union. No information, so far as he was aware, had been withheld by the Commissioners of Police from the Local Government Board affecting Mr. Browne's character for integrity; but, Mr. Browne, on an official inquiry, had been proved guilty of considerable neglect in the discharge of his duties as a clerk in the carriage department of the Dublin Police, and his services had consequently been dispensed with on the re-organization of the department with which he had been connected.

MR. SULLIVAN gave Notice that he would on Monday ask if it was intended to refuse Mr. Browne the superannuation allowance to which he was entitled after 25 years of honest service?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could answer that at once. The office which Mr. Browne held was discontinued in consequence of a re-organization of the department, and as he had been guilty of considerable negligence the Chief Commissioner of Police declined to give him the necessary certificate of diligent and faithful performance of his duties, and the Treasury declined to grant him the ordinary superannuation allowance.

MR. SULLIVAN gave Notice that he would, on a future occasion, call attention to the subject, and move a Resolution.

IRELAND—DUNDRUM ASYLUM.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the salary of Dr. John Hughes, the visiting physician of the Central Asylum at Dundrum, county of Dublin, is included in the Estimates or Supplementary Estimates, and if not, for what reason is such salary excluded; if it is not the fact that Dr. Hughes was appointed to the office of visiting physician to the said asylum by warrant of the Lord Lieutenant in the month of February 1874; if he has since discharged the duties of such office; and, was the salary of Dr. Hughes placed on the list of Irish Estimates furnished to the Treasury by the Irish Executive Government, and was such salary expunged at the instance of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland or the Chief Secretary; and if not, under what circumstances was such salary struck out?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, if the hon. Member will refer to the Estimates presented to Parliament for the current year, he will see that no provision has been made for the salary of the visiting physician. I must ask to be allowed to defer giving an explanation of the circumstances until the Vote is taken in Committee of Supply. That seems to me to be the proper occasion for hon. Members to ask for information respecting the Estimates, and I shall always be ready, for my own part, to give them all that I possibly can; but it seems to me most undesirable to occupy the time of the House at this moment with an explanation which would necessarily be somewhat lengthy, and which can be much better given when the Vote shall be under discussion.

reason that it had proved a failure with regard to the purposes for which it was intended. Instruction in agriculture would still be given in the schools which had hitherto been connected with the farm, and in other schools throughout the country generally.

METROPOLIS—MUSIC IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS asked the First Commissioner of Works, By whose authority, and under what circumstances, the playing of the band from 6.30 to 8.30 p.m., in St. James's Park, has been forbidden?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, the band of the Corps of Commissionaires was allowed to play in the Cambridge Enclosure from 1862 to 1864; but in the course of the latter year loud complaints were made and remonstrances addressed by those who lived in the houses around, as to the crowds of disorderly persons, both of women and men, that collected to hear the band. In 1865 and 1866 these complaints were repeatedly renewed, and the position of the band in the Enclosure was several times altered, but without any good effect following. In 1867 it was removed to a site in St. James's Park opposite the Horse Guards, and there it played until 1870. This year the band renewed their application to play in the Cambridge Enclosure, and stated that the occupation of the houses in the neighbourhood was changed, and they had, therefore, a hope that no objection would be made. Being, as the House will readily understand, anxious to meet the wishes of these old soldiers, I gave the permission; but I had no sooner done so than serious remonstrances from the same quarters were made, and, having satisfied myself that there was ground for these complaints, I had no option but to withdraw that permission, at the same time offering them the position in St. James's Park which they had occupied from 1867 till 1870. I need scarcely assure the House that throughout this matter I have acted after due consultation and in concert with the illustrious Duke who is the Ranger of St. James's Park.

INDIA—AGRARIAN DISTURBANCES IN BENGAL.—QUESTION.

MR. E. NOEL asked the Under Secretary for India, Whether the India Office can furnish any information or correspondence with respect to a Bill lately introduced by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, purporting to legislate concerning the threatened agrarian disturbances arising out of the unsettled relations between landlord and tenant?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that Correspondence on the subject was at the India Office. There would be no objection to lay it on the Table of the House after the Legislative Council had finished its consideration of a Bill which had been laid before it by the Lieutenant Governor, in order, if possible, to bring about a satisfactory settlement of the difficulty.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA AND VOLUNTEERS.—QUESTION.

MR. PLUNKETT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering that Adjutants of Volunteers have to perform harder duty than Adjutants of Militia, he will put the former on as favourable a footing as the latter in regard to pension?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he was not prepared to admit that adjutants of Volunteers had harder duties to perform than those of adjutants of Militia, in addition to which the duties of the last-named class of officers were certainly the more responsible. The new localization scheme had put additional duties on the adjutants of Militia, and the rate of their retiring allowances had been fixed accordingly. He was not prepared to offer the same terms to adjutants of Volunteers.

THE IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—CASE OF MR. J. A. BROWNE. QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to the Correspondence between the Irish Local Government Board and the Guardians of the North Dublin Union, in reference to an appointment to the office of Collector of Public Rates, of Mr. J. A. Browne, who had been discontinued as clerk in the carriage department of the Dublin Me-

now occupy. There were 11 Bills mentioned in the Queen's Speech. Of these the first was the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill. That Bill has passed and has received the Royal Assent. Three other measures—the Artizans Dwellings Bill, the Public Health Bill, and the Friendly Societies Bill—have practically passed. The Land Titles and Transfer Bill and the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill have passed the House of Lords, and now stand for Committee in this House. The Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill has far advanced in Committee. That makes seven. The Labour Laws Bill, making the eighth, stands for a second reading. The Agricultural Holdings (England) Bill, the ninth measure, will in a few minutes, on my Motion, I hope, reach a second reading. It has already passed the House of Lords. The tenth measure is the Offences Against the Person Bill, and that stands for a second reading. The eleventh measure, relating to the Pollution of Rivers, is now in Committee in the House of Lords. Therefore, I think the House will agree with me, that when they consider the position which these 11 measures occupy in the Business of the Session, there is no reason whatever to assume that they may not all be carried to a successful termination. Consequently, the House will feel that the noble Lord, who more, I think, than a month ago made his inquiry, is scarcely justified in having done so by the progress which we have since made with the 11 measures recommended to Parliament in the Queen's Speech. Some of those measures have passed, and every one of them has been considerably advanced. Now, Sir, having made this statement, I may be permitted to remark that Her Majesty's Government, in conducting the Business of the House this year, have experienced a difficulty which has rarely occurred. Certainly it has not previously occurred in my memory, although I have been a Member of this House for nearly 40 years. It is this—The House is well aware that every year there are expiring laws which would cease to exist at a certain time, and not generally during the period when Parliament is sitting. Well, our predecessors—I do not mean our immediate predecessors only, for I trust they will not suppose I am making any particular remark on their conduct

—but our predecessors for many years, in order to devote all the time at their command to novel legislation, have treated these expiring laws, though they are often of the highest and foremost interest, in the following manner:—They have shuffled them all at the end of the Session into what is called a Continuance Bill, and a wearied House, being unable to resist the inevitable result, has sanctioned that course. But after we acceded to office the abuse of this system became, at the end of last Session, so flagrant that the House was no longer prepared to sanction it. It is, indeed, impossible to complain of the conduct of the Irish Members when they protested against a measure which suspended the constitutional liberties of their country being passed as a mere Continuance Bill. Considerable opposition was offered to that Bill on that occasion by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I gave them a pledge that if they would forego that opposition they should have full opportunity of discussing the measure in the present Session. That pledge, on the part of the Government, I have redeemed. But what has been the consequence of the redemption of that pledge? Why, five weeks of the Government time and a more considerable period of the time of the House—for several days belonged to independent Members, of which we were obliged to avail ourselves—were spent in discussing a Bill which was an expiring Bill, and which, under other circumstances, would have been passed without discussion as a Continuance Bill at the end of the Session. Therefore, I trust the House will remember that we have not only made the progress I have indicated with those measures which in the Speech from the Throne we promised to bring forward, but that we have also experienced a very serious difficulty in contending against the consequences of giving up the old system of dealing with measures of great importance when they were expiring laws. I say this because we have yet to deal with an expiring law, and that one of the greatest importance and upon a most interesting subject—I mean the Criminal Law Continuance Act. It is one of that group of Bills with which the Government attempt to deal with the long-vexed question of labour and the relations between master and servant. I hope the measures which my right hon.

OPENING OF PLACES OF AMUSEMENT
ON SUNDAY—THE ACT 21 GEO. III.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the measure he proposes to introduce for amending the statute 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, he will provide that no action shall be brought without the sanction of the Attorney General?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the subject was now receiving the consideration of the hon. and learned Attorney General and himself. Pending legislation on the matter, the Attorney General would be bound to act under provisions of the existing law.

ORDNANCE SURVEY—SOUTH WILTS AND DORSETSHIRE.—QUESTION.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any progress is being made with the Ordnance Survey for South Wilts and Dorsetshire; and, if such progress is being made, how soon any reliable hope can be held out that such survey shall be published?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, the survey of South Wilts, as a whole, has not yet been commenced; but at the urgent request of the Antiquarian Society, the district about Salisbury, including Stonehenge, has been surveyed. Neither has Dorsetshire been yet surveyed, for while fully admitting the great importance of that county in many respects, yet it is not a mineral county, and I have, therefore, with regret, been unable, as yet, to order it to be surveyed.

ARMY—THE SOMERSETSHIRE MILITIA
—THE ENCAMPMENT AT LEIGH HILL.

QUESTION.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the commanding officer of the 1st Somerset Militia has made complaint of the state of the encampment at Leigh Hill, near Taunton, and whether the men's tents are saturated with water, and their beds and bedding soaked, as mentioned in a paragraph in the "Times" newspaper?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, no complaint had reached the War Department; but the General Officer in command of the district would make an inquiry.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORDERS OF THE DAY AND NOTICES OF MOTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate thereupon [22nd June] read.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I very much regret that my unavoidable absence from the commencement of the Business of the House on Tuesday last has occasioned the Motion which I placed on the Paper to be to some extent misunderstood, from want of explanation. During the various periods in which it has been my fortune or fate to conduct the Business of this House, I have never at any time when I have appealed to independent Members to surrender their privileges to the Government contemplated accepting such a sacrifice on their part unless it was made unanimously. These are questions which, in my mind, ought not to be matters for controversy or division, and had I been here and heard the objections which were made I should have at once terminated the discussion by not pressing the Motion. The fault is my own I acknowledge, and I regret extremely that I was not present. And, indeed, acting in that spirit, I rise now to move that the Order which is on the Paper should be discharged. But as I am on my legs, and as the Business of the House this Session has been a subject of considerable interest, I will, with the permission of the House, make one or two remarks on the progress and prospects of Public Business, because I think it is a subject on which considerable misunderstanding exists. Some time ago the noble Lord who is the Leader of the Opposition inquired of me whether I could inform him what were the measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech which I contemplated would be carried to a successful issue this Session. I thought the question of the noble Lord then premature, and I think that was the general opinion of the House: but we are now more advanced in the Session, and I will therefore call the attention of the House to the measures which were introduced to the notice of the House by the Queen's Speech, and to the position which they now occupy. There were 11 Bills mentioned in the Queen's Speech. Of these the first was the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill. That Bill has passed and has received the Royal Assent. Three other measures—the Artizans Dwellings Bill, the Public Health Bill, and the Friendly Societies Bill—have practically passed. The Land Titles and Transfer Bill and the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill have passed the House of Lords, and now stand for Committee in this House. The Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill has far advanced in Committee. That makes seven. The Labour Laws Bill, making the eighth, stands for a second reading. The Agricultural Holdings (England) Bill, the ninth measure, will in a few minutes, on my Motion, I hope, reach a second reading. It has already passed the House of Lords. The tenth measure is the Offences Against the Person Bill, and that stands for a second reading. The eleventh measure, relating to the Pollution of Rivers, is now in Committee in the House of Lords. Therefore, I think the House will agree with me, that when they consider the position which these 11 measures occupy in the Business of the Session, there is no reason whatever to assume that they may not all be carried to a successful termination. Consequently, the House will feel that the noble Lord, who more, I think, than a month ago made his inquiry, is scarcely justified in having done so by the progress which we have since made with the 11 measures recommended to Parliament in the Queen's Speech. Some of those measures have passed, and every one of them has been considerably advanced. Now, Sir, having made this statement, I may be permitted to remark that Her Majesty's Government, in conducting the Business of the House this year, have experienced a difficulty which has rarely occurred. Certainly it has not previously occurred in my memory, although I have been a Member of this House for nearly 40 years. It is this—The House is well aware that every year there are expiring laws which would cease to exist at a certain time, and not generally during the period when Parliament is sitting. Well, our predecessors—I do not mean our immediate predecessors only, for I trust they will not suppose I am making any particular remark on their conduct

—but our predecessors for many years, in order to devote all the time at their command to novel legislation, have treated these expiring laws, though they are often of the highest and foremost interest, in the following manner:—They have shuffled them all at the end of the Session into what is called a Continuance Bill, and a wearied House, being unable to resist the inevitable result, has sanctioned that course. But after we acceded to office the abuse of this system became, at the end of last Session, so flagrant that the House was no longer prepared to sanction it. It is, indeed, impossible to complain of the conduct of the Irish Members when they protested against a measure which suspended the constitutional liberties of their country being passed as a mere Continuance Bill. Considerable opposition was offered to that Bill on that occasion by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I gave them a pledge that if they would forego that opposition they should have full opportunity of discussing the measure in the present Session. That pledge, on the part of the Government, I have redeemed. But what has been the consequence of the redemption of that pledge? Why, five weeks of the Government time and a more considerable period of the time of the House—for several days belonged to independent Members, of which we were obliged to avail ourselves—were spent in discussing a Bill which was an expiring Bill, and which, under other circumstances, would have been passed without discussion as a Continuance Bill at the end of the Session. Therefore, I trust the House will remember that we have not only made the progress I have indicated with those measures which in the Speech from the Throne we promised to bring forward, but that we have also experienced a very serious difficulty in contending against the consequences of giving up the old system of dealing with measures of great importance when they were expiring laws. I say this because we have yet to deal with an expiring law, and that one of the greatest importance and upon a most interesting subject—I mean the Criminal Law Continuance Act. It is one of that group of Bills with which the Government attempt to deal with the long-vexed question of labour and the relations between master and servant. I hope the measures which my right hon.

Friend the Home Secretary will call upon the House to consider in the course of a few days are such as will recommend themselves to the minds of those hon. Gentlemen who are deeply interested in the question, and that we shall encounter no vexatious opposition to them. I trust they will be taken as a whole, and as a generous and wise settlement of a great public controversy. The House must see, however, that those who have the conduct of the Public Business of the House have had to contend with difficulties of rare occurrence, such as have arisen from dealing with these expiring laws. It would, in fact, have been impossible to counteract these difficulties if the Government had not appealed to the generous sympathy of the House to allow us at an earlier period than usual to avail ourselves of Morning Sittings. It was from no caprice or negligence that we made that demand, which was but the necessary consequence of having to pass the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill. Well, these Morning Sittings have not entirely compensated us for the loss of these five weeks, but they have greatly assisted us; and in case of difficulties arising in respect of this question to which I have alluded—namely, the expiring law of master and servant—or in respect of other questions, it is only by the generous support of the House that we can possibly carry the measures announced in the Queen's Speech, especially when we have to deal with difficulties so great and of such rare occurrence. With regard to asking for Tuesdays the other day, I believe it really arose from the following circumstance:—It appeared that the Gentlemen of the long robe on both sides of the House were anxious to have a discussion on Tuesday on the legal measures which are now before us—namely, the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill and the Land Titles and Transfer Bill. Now Tuesday morning was most inconvenient for them and they therefore appealed to the Government to assist them in obtaining another Tuesday. As it had been customary, though not quite so early in the year, for the Government to apply that Tuesday might be given up, it was thought that it might be for their convenience to make a general appeal at that time. I am not for a moment wishing to contest the right of the House to demur to that arrangement. I am grateful to the House for the indulgence we have experienced in obtaining Morning Sittings, without which, no doubt, our position would have been greatly inferior to what it is at present in regard to the progress of Business. As far as we can avail ourselves of the time we can command we shall endeavour to forward the measures which we have placed before the House, and if we find it necessary to ask the House to assist us I feel confident that I shall not appeal to the House in vain. In conclusion the right hon. Gentleman moved that the Order be discharged.

MR. DILLWYN said, he thought it would be agreed that no factious opposition to the Government had arisen from the Members of the Opposition who sat below the Gangway. He must remark, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had somewhat changed his ground. Some time ago, he said the House would have to sit until it had passed all the measures which had been proposed by the Government and read a second time. Now, however, the right hon. Gentleman proposed to pass only the measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech, and this was, of course, a very different thing indeed. The former statement produced a slight feeling of alarm among hon. Members, who, consequently, were less willing the other night than they would otherwise have been to comply with the wishes of the Government. Another cause of protest was that private Members had the idea that their privileges were being invaded, and they had an objection to such a precedent being adopted. The Prime Minister had given many good reasons for what had been done, and as the right hon. Gentleman was always ready to consult their convenience, he should be unwilling to show any undue opposition to the Government.

MR. HUNT pointed out that the present Government had not proposed to re-enact the rule which was in force during the last Parliament with reference to Committee of Supply. In the present Parliament independent Members had had the opportunity of bringing questions forward on the Motion for going into Supply on every night when Supply was down.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I wish to make a few observations

on this question before the House proceeds to another subject, which I know it is anxious should not be delayed. The hon. Members who were in the House last Tuesday will be aware that when I rose immediately after the Secretary of State for War I did not do so with the object or intention of interposing any obstacle whatever in the way of the Government obtaining any portion of the time of the House which might be considered necessary for the successful prosecution of the measures before it. What I did venture to remark upon was that the unusual Motion—a Motion which, as I showed, was made at a considerably earlier period of the Session than it had ever been made before, with the exception of last Session—should be made without any statement whatever on the part of the Government as to their intentions with regard to the numerous measures before the House. It appears now the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman was made without sufficient consideration; for although he would, no doubt, be supported by a large majority in any demand on the time of the House which he might think it necessary to make, he has now withdrawn his Motion without any statement whatever with regard to the progress of Business. I do not recollect the exact occasion to which the right hon. Gentleman refers when he says that I prematurely asked the Government their intentions with regard to the prosecution of their measures. I do not think that until last Tuesday I have ever done so—that is, asked the Government whether they had any intention of abandoning any of the measures they had introduced. What I think I have done on more than one occasion was to point out some inconveniences experienced, owing to the very short notice which on several occasions the Government gave with reference to the course of Business. The consideration of one measure has been dropped, and another taken up with very small notice; and although I am quite willing to bear testimony to the courtesy which characterizes all the proceedings of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Business of the House, I think the course which has been taken in this respect has been sometimes not altogether for the convenience of the House. I cannot charge my memory with having on any occasion before last Tuesday afternoon expressed any opinion as to what measures the Government intended to take; but, Sir, I think the time has now come when it would be very much to the convenience of the House, and expedite the Public Business, if a somewhat more definite announcement were made as to the measures to be seriously prosecuted. The right hon. Gentleman, in the observations he has made, has chiefly confined himself to the measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech; but there are other measures of great importance before the House not mentioned in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, and which, if proceeded with, will occupy a considerable portion of our time. I admit there are Bills mentioned in the Queen's Speech which may be said to be practically disposed of as far as we are concerned. The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill and the Public Health Bill are disposed of, and great progress has been made with the Friendly Societies Bill, and a measure introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the National Debt Bill. But there remains a very formidable list of measures, some of which have hardly been considered by this House at all. There is the Agricultural Holdings (England) Bill, which has not yet been considered by this House. There are two Bills, dealing with the relations of employer and employed. There are the Land Titles and Transfer Bill and the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (1873) Amendment Bill, which have not yet been reached. The measures introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Local Authorities Loans Bill, the Public Works Loans Bill, the Savings Banks Bill, and another Bill relating to Banks, have not been fully discussed. Having now reached the 24th of June, I think the right hon. Gentleman and the Government must be of extremely sanguine dispositions if they think that all these Bills can pass during the present Session; and I think it would tend to the convenience of the House and the despatch of Public Business if the right hon. Gentleman could harden his heart and commence that operation generally known as "the Massacre of the Innocents" by giving us a preliminary massacre. I admit that the Government is not responsible for the expenditure of time on the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill; but I must point out that the right

hon. Gentleman has taken credit for this on two different accounts. The Bill was introduced in the Queen's Speech as a question of public policy in regard to Ireland, and it was received in that way by the House. But now the right hon. Gentleman takes credit for that as being an improvement upon the procedure of his Predecessors, who were content to deal with these matters in Expiring Laws Continuance Bills. I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that it fell to the lot of the late Government twice to pass measures relating to the preservation of peace in Ireland, which also took up a considerable portion of the time of the Session, and at the same time they were able to pass other measures of the very greatest importance. I think there are measures which have occupied a good deal of the time of the House, for which the Government are responsible, and which have occupied a larger share of the time of the House, in proportion to their importance, than measures which are now waiting for consideration. I do not think that either the Regimental Exchanges Bill, or the Bill, introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, relating to an imaginary scheme for the reduction of the National Debt, was of so much importance that the time of the House should be wasted upon them while such questions as the improvement of the merchant shipping laws, and the relations between employers and their workmen, were left to be discussed at the fag-end of the Session. There is only one other observation I wish to make. It will be in the recollection of many hon. Members that no subject was made more frequent ground of complaint against the late Government than the manner in which, according to hon. Gentlemen opposite, we neglected the primary business of the House of Commons—namely, the business of Supply. We were complained of for taking the Estimates late for the purpose of proceeding with legislation which hon. Gentlemen stated was unnecessary. What has been the course of the present Government with regard to Supply? In the last year of the late Government, in which I believe that complaint was as usual brought forward, I have ascertained that the Committee of Supply sat, before the period at which we have arrived, no less than 13 times. I find up to the present time the House has had Committee of Supply only five times; and, although the Army and Navy Estimates have been entirely or nearly all disposed of, we have at present spent only one evening on the Civil Service Estimates, and only one class of those Estimates has yet been voted. We have, as yet, had no discussion on the Education Estimates, and there is no probability that a day will shortly be fixed for the discussion; and we have not yet been informed by the Government what are their intentions with regard to an increased grant for Irish Education, for the increase of the salaries of the National School teachers. Something has been said about Supplementary Estimates; but not a word has been stated to the House as to the intentions of the Government. When we look at the number of measures which I have read over, all of which will require very great consideration—when we look at the state of Supply, and the small progress that has been made in the Civil Service Estimates—I am of opinion that the right hon. Gentleman would exercise a wise discretion if he made up his mind to sacrifice some of the Bills now before us, so that we might devote ourselves more completely and more satisfactorily to the consideration of those that remain.

MR. PLIMSOLL ventured to express the extreme anxiety that was not only felt in the House, but also out-of-doors that the Government would find or make time to carry the Merchant Shipping Bill to its termination. To do so would be to terminate a state of things that was very troublesome to shipowners themselves, and which also caused a frightful loss of life. He did not refer merely to unseaworthy ships or to overloading, because the Bill ignored this, but because the Bill afforded an opportunity to insert clauses which would bring about a better state of things. He had carefully abstained from occupying the attention of the Committee whilst the preliminary clauses were under discussion, and he had used all his influence with others to prevent discussion until they should reach the heart of the subject; and when the Government should bring on the Bill again they would find that they would be able to proceed much more rapidly in the future than they had been able to do in the past, and he had every confidence that they would be able to make the Bill into a satisfactory measure, and thus secure an immense amount of good. He believed that a satisfactory measure passed upon this subject would earn for the Government an amount of gratitude which no Government had received during this century.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought that an eulogium had been passed upon the Merchant Shipping Bill to which it was not entitled; and he hoped that, whatever Bills the Government should resolve to abandon, they would include it among them, for if it passed it would perpetuate all existing evils and add to the loss of life which the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) deplored. He congratulated independent Members upon the stand which they had made for their privileges. The chief cause of the loss of time this Session was not the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill. That, no doubt, took up a certain portion of time; but the Government ought to have foreseen that result. He contended that the real cause of all their difficulties in the present and in the past Sessions was the bad practice of this and of other Governments in overloading the Paper. At the beginning of the Session there was an amount of Business introduced that no rational man could hope to see carried. It was very much to be regretted that at this period of the Session the House had not had an opportunity of dealing with the three principal Votes in the Navy Estimates. He should like to know when the Navy Estimates would be likely to be brought forward again?

MR. GOLDSMID observed, that the last Government was frequently attacked for asking for Votes at this period of the Session, and yet now there was an intimation that there would be still further Votes on Account asked for within the next three days. He was told that if these Votes on Account were not taken the service of the country would have to come to a full stop. He desired therefore to ask whether the House would have a proper opportunity of considering the remaining Votes of Supply, and whether in another Session care would be taken that there would be no necessity for asking for Votes on Account at so late a period of the Session.

MR. BUTT pointed out that it was not owing to the discussions on the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill that Supply was so backward. During the whole month of February the House had sat only three times after 10 o'clock, and if the Estimates had been ready much progress in Supply might have been made. They had heard of the privileges of Members; but it was really the privileges of the people which were in question. He wished to remind hon. Gentlemen that the highest function of this House was not legislation. Its highest function was to be the Grand Inquest of the Nation and the Committee of Grievances of the Nation. What had given the House of Commons its great position was that it had the power to originate discussions apart from the Business brought forward by the Ministers of the Crown. He believed that if ever the time came when this House would lose its character for being the Committee of Grievances of the Nation it would also lose its influence with the people. Of late years great encroachments had been made on the liberties of the House. It was true that each in itself was but a small encroachment; but it was by gradual encroachments Session by Session, day by day—each encroachment small in itself, and of a character which it would appear factious to resist—that in progress of time serious inroads were made upon the liberties of the House.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) BILL.—[BILL 177.]

[Lords.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, the Bill, of which I have now to move the second reading, is one which seeks to supply the deficiencies of the law which at present relates to agricultural tenancies. This is a subject which has been treated in this House more than once. It is one with which the House used to be familiar. I see several hon. Members now who, throwing their memory over a space of scarcely less than 30 years, can recall the time when Mr. Pusey, the Member for Berkshire, interested himself in this question, and took various opportunities of submitting it to the consideration of the House. At that time there was much agitation in the country in favour of agricultural leases—of long agricultural leases—and

Mr. Pusey, who was, both by his lineage, his estate, his rare accomplishments, and fine abilities, one of the most distinguished country Gentlemen who ever sat in the House of Commons, was of opinion that that was a policy which ought to be resisted. He believed that the granting of leases was not demanded at all, or only in a slight degree, by the farmers themselves; but that the demand came from a party out of the agricultural world—a party distinguished by perseverance, which contained many economists of great distinction, many philosophers, and many who took rather a cosmopolitan than a national view of public affairs. Mr. Pusey thought that leases had a tendency to divorce the proprietor of the soil from the land, and ultimately would lead to the breaking up of estates and destroy the influence of that class to whose influence he attributed—and, I believe, rightly attributed—much of the liberties and welfare of the country. With these views he moved for Committees, and subsequently introduced Bills, the object of which was to secure—Mr. Pusey was the first person to introduce into this House the term—"the tenant right" of the occupier, and at the same time to guard the just rights of the owner. His object was—to use his own words—"to secure to the tenant the advantage of his unexhausted improvements and to prevent the deterioration of the soil." Mr. Pusey was not successful in the efforts he attempted to make. His views were comparatively novel. The great body of the country gentlemen did not sufficiently sympathize with him; and they were very much influenced in the course they adopted by the fact that they knew the cry or claim for what they called leases was not one which originated, generally speaking, with the great body of farmers themselves; that it was extraneous, and they did not believe it was one which would endure. Under these circumstances, Mr. Pusey unhappily, I think, gave up much expectation of success. There were influences against his success at that period which he had not taken sufficiently into account. In the first place, that party in the country who advocated long leases of the soil, thought that if they favoured the plans of Mr. Pusey their views would necessarily not be adopted. Then, again, there was an element which even a Gentleman so well acquainted with agriculture and rural life as he was had not sufficiently counted upon, and that was what he called the hereditary tenant—that is, the tenant whose fathers and forefathers had cultivated the very farm he had cultivated himself, and whose family for a long period, even for more than a century, had lived upon the soil. It was difficult—it was impossible—to persuade a class of men of that character that they were in danger of being suddenly turned out of their holdings—that they would forfeit the capital they had invested in the soil—when they were conscious of the fact that for generations upon that soil their family had existed, and still lived. These were two influences which, no doubt, very much acted against Mr. Pusey. There was another, and that was that by degrees in this country a number of usages had grown up—some of them, indeed very ancient, some of them of recent development—by which the tenant of the soil, by general agreement with the owners, was preserved from the sacrifice of his capital in case he quitted his holding. All these influences tended to prevent any enthusiasm being felt in those views—so profound, so just, and so salutary—which influenced that accomplished man in the counsels which he frequently gave to the country and to the House of Commons. When he ultimately relinquished the struggle, at least so far as the House was concerned, he said this—I am accurate in the words, for he used them to the humble individual who now addresses the House—he said "it was the only blot in the agricultural hierarchy"—the fact that the tenant-at-will had no security for the capital which he ought to be encouraged to invest in the soil. Now, many years have elapsed since those days, and for some time very little public excitement upon the subject existed. The cry for leases gradually died away—not originating, generally speaking, with the farmers themselves. But of late years the philosophers, who are a vigilant body, and the economists, who are always active, have not omitted the opportunities that were offered them of dilating on what Mr. Pusey described as "the only blot in the agricultural hierarchy;" and by a constant agitation, by speeches and by writings, a certain degree of opinion on the subject has been formed. Since then the question of land tenure has been much examined with respect to a neighbouring country—Ireland. We have legislated upon it, and that, no doubt, has much tended also to stimulate the feeling on the question. But the view that Mr. Pusey took of this matter is one which cannot be impressed too completely on the House. When he came forward to advocate what was then for the first time called tenant-right, it was to protect, as he believed, the interests of the owners of the soil—to place them in a stronger position—as well as to place the occupiers in a juster position, and to remove the only circumstance which, in the arrangements of the different classes connected with agriculture, might lead to discontent, and be the pretext of ultimate changes in the tenure of land or the conduct of estates, which he deeply deprecated, and which had nothing whatever to do with the particular possible grievance which he wished to combat. Well, these views are now, as I said, still prevalent, and within the last few years have considerably extended. No doubt, if you take the case of a tenant-at-will, a yearly tenant, it is to be deprecated that he should be placed in a position in which he is not protected so far as regards the capital which he invests in the soil; and it is, no doubt, a subject to be lamented that there should be any circumstances in existence which prevent that application of capital to the soil which it is the interest of all classes alike to encourage. It is highly to be deprecated at all times that in the mutual arrangements of classes like the owners and occupiers of the soil of England—classes on whom we so much depend for the good order of the country—there should be anything which would be the cause of latent discontent or disturbance. Under these circumstances Her Majesty's Government have considered this subject. They have felt that it is of importance that we should deal with it, and that it should not be left to the speculative arrangements of classes who are not really anxious to remove the particular grievance which I am asking you to-night to consider, and who, taking advantage of the discontent which the grievance occasions, may be induced to advocate changes and views which are of a much larger and, in my opinion, of a pernicious character.

Considering, therefore, this subject, we have introduced a measure which has passed through the House of Lords without a division; and I will briefly put before the House the character of the measure. The measure proposes as a principle to secure compensation to the tenant for what in modern phrase are called unexhausted improvements; and to the owner compensation for waste and for injury which result from the breaking of covenants or contracts. It proposes to compensate the tenant for his improvements, which are now, for the first time, arranged under three classes. I do not know whether the House will pardon me for reading the contents of these classes, which are, no doubt, familiar to many hon. Members, but probably they will not object to my doing so. The tenant is to receive compensation for his improvements in these three classes—

FIRST CLASS.

Drainage of land.	Making or improving
Erection or enlargement of buildings.	of watercourses, ponds, wells, or reservoirs, or of works for supply of water for agricultural or domestic purposes.
Laying down of permanent pasture.	Making of fences.
Making and planting of osier beds.	Planting of hops.
Making of water meadows or works of irrigation.	Planting of orchards.
Making of gardens.	Reclamation of waste land.
Making or improving of roads or bridges.	Warping of land.

SECOND CLASS.

Boning of pasture land with undissolved bones.	Clay-burning.
Chalking of land.	Claying of land.
	Liming of land.
	Marling of land.

THIRD CLASS.

Application to land of purchased artificial or other manure.	Consumption on the holding by cattle, sheep, or pigs of cake or other feeding stuff not produced on the holding.
--	--

The tenant is to receive compensation for improvements in these three classes. The improvements in the first class are to be exhausted in 20 years; the improvements in the second class are to be exhausted in seven years; and in the third class the improvements are to be exhausted in two years. The tenant cannot make im-ment that such legislation was an undue interference with the rights of property was one that had received its death-blow, and it only remained to consider in what manner legislation could be most beneficially applied. When they came to deal with the question of landlord and tenant, they admitted the right of the State to interfere with the conditions under which land could be owned and occupied within itself. That right, indeed, could hardly be denied. Every State had a prima facie inherent right to deal with those conditions so, as far as possible, to promote the general good of the community. But in England, as in most civilized countries, the State had for a long time forbore to exercise that right, and individuals had been allowed to buy and sell without restraint or restriction. It was a strange thing as regarded our own country, that while the State had forbore for a long time to interfere with the land tenure, when that interference had been called for and obtained it had not been on behalf of the general community, at a possible loss to some individual, but on the part of some individual to authorize the appropriation of those commons and open spaces over which the general community still had some right. He supposed that the right of the State to interfere was justified by the interest which it had in the development of the productive powers of the land and the well-being of the country. Now, what was the justification for the proposed legislation? He had looked at the Bill, but it was in the unfortunate predicament of having no Preamble. In this respect it contrasted rather unfavourably with another Bill presented by the hon. Baronet the Member for Devonshire (Sir Thomas Acland), which was called a Bill to secure a fair compensation to agricultural tenants, and otherwise to amend the laws relating to agricultural tenancies in England. That was a clear and tangible title and they knew what it meant: but when they had a Bill which was called merely the "Agricultural Holdings Bill," the vagueness of the title opened up a wide field of surmise and speculation as to what its provisions might be intended to effect. However, he would assume that the object of the two Bills was the same, and proceed to inquire what was the demand that had called for this proposal for legislation.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

The demand had been upon the part of the tenant-farmers of England, first, for compensation for unexhausted improvements, and, secondly, for greater security of tenure. How were these demands met by the proposals of the Government? The Bill proposed to enact that, on certain specified conditions, compensation should be given to the tenant on the termination of his tenancy; but if the landlord preferred to let his land, stipulating that no such compensation should be given, he was quite at liberty to do so. Then as regarded security of tenure, one year's notice was to be given instead of six months, which was now sufficient; but if the landlord preferred six months he was to be perfectly at liberty to stand on the old principle. In fact, this Bill allowed everybody to do exactly what he could do at present without it, and compelled no one to do anything which he had not hitherto done and did not wish to do. All that the Bill did was to give an indication of the course which the Legislature thought ought to be pursued, but which Her Majesty's Government had not the courage to say should be carried out. He questioned whether this permissive legislation would ever be satisfactory. But he should be told that he had not given a fair description of the Bill, inasmuch as it gave power to limited owners to charge their estates in respect of this compensation. So far, so good; but the question was not what should be done for the limited owner, but what should be done for the tenant-farmer; and this boon to the limited owner was not an incident of this particular Bill but one which must be given in any Bill upon this subject, whether permissive or compulsory. Then it was said that it would create a presumption in law in favour of the tenant farmer which he never had before. What did the right hon. Member care for a presumption in law which he could sweep away with one stroke of his pen? The very men who would sweep it away were those for whom they had initiated this legislation. If all landlords had been good ones no such legislation would have been required. He was not quite clear whether the letting value was to come into consideration at all or not.

Mr. DISRAELI: There is no letting value at all. It has been struck out of the Bill.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN was glad that it had been struck out. But in "another place" the letting value was spoken of as the keynote of the Bill; but the Government had, perhaps, been open to conviction. If the letting value was to be in any way a criterion by which compensation was to be computed, the Bill would render certain a great and immediate rise of rent. Hitherto, a landlord when told that a certain farm would let for £100 a-year more had often been wont to say, if the circumstances permitted, that the occupier was a good tenant, and as he had had it so long, the rent need not be raised until the next vacancy; but as soon as this Bill passed, if compensation was to have relation to letting value, farmers would be put up to rack rent and fined heavily for the kindness which was done them, or else landlords would be fined heavily for their kindness in having let their land below its market value. Now, he had looked very carefully through the Bill to see what its principles might be. One principle enunciated was the great and sacred principle of the freedom of contract, and that was the golden image which the Government had set up and before which they were all expected to bow down. Now there was nothing more dangerous than to be persuaded and guided by a phrase, without fully understanding and thoroughly analyzing its meaning. Now he put it to the House that freedom of contract, or rather freedom in contract, did not at this moment really exist in the hiring of land. Freedom there certainly was upon the side of the landlord, but the only freedom which the farmer had was the freedom to decline the contract if he did not like the landlord's conditions. Yes, but that was not freedom in contract—it was freedom to avoid entering into any contract at all. What he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) called freedom of contract was freedom on both sides, or something akin to freedom on both sides; both parties starting from some equitable basis to the conditions of which both were equally bound to conform. But when the letter of land was bound by nothing but his own will and pleasure, and the hirer of the land, if he contracted at all, was bound as to the conditions by the will and pleasure of the letter, he contended that there was no real freedom of contract in the common-sense application of the words.

And if it was replied to him that there was freedom of contract, because the letter of land was free to make what conditions he pleased, and the hirer was free to accept or reject them, then he maintained that such freedom was only vain and illusory, and that if it was sufficient freedom and there was no need for anything else, what was the necessity for introducing any Bill upon the subject at all? But there had been lately published in pamphlet form the opinion of a noble Duke upon this "freedom of contract" question which had been sometimes quoted and to which he wished to allude. The noble Duke took the case of a vacant farm, with six competitors for the same. One man offered 30*s.* per acre on condition that at the end of his tenancy his claim for compensation for improvements should be recognized. The landlord declined, because he could get the same rent from one of the other five applicants without any such condition. And the noble Duke contended that what the advocates of compulsion sought was to deprive the other five applicants of their liberty of contract, in order that the freedom of the first might be secured. With great deference to so high an authority, he ventured to think that that was an entirely erroneous way of stating the case. No one asked that in such a case any advantage should be given to the one over the five, but that all six should have a better starting-point, equally advantageous to all, before they began to bargain for the farm. Just as if six men were going into battle, one requiring a sword and the other five so anxious for the fray that they were willing to fight unarmed, a good general would insist upon their all being equally armed before the fight. And let it be especially noted that this which was asked was, though an advantage to the hirer, by no means an unfair weight upon the letter of land, because it was an advantage which would have a direct tendency to increase the amount of rent which would be offered for his land. Let them remember, moreover, that if they imposed restrictions upon freedom of contract in this matter they would be introducing no new principle in legislation. They had placed restriction upon labour in factories; they had put restriction upon labour in mines; they had passed Truck Acts, and they had interfered with liberty in the matter of education. He had been told the other day, when he used the same argument upon a clause in the Merchant Shipping Bill, that there was no analogy between the cases, because in all the Acts he had mentioned they had been protecting women and children who could not protect themselves, whereas sailors—and now tenant-farmers were perfectly well able to do so. But he maintained that the Truck Acts were exactly a case in point. What were the Truck Acts? It was complained that certain manufacturers paid their workmen partly in kind and that the workmen thereby got an inferior article. Parliament interfered and directly broke in upon freedom of contract by enacting that wages should be paid in the current coin of the Realm. And he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) put it to the landowners and country gentlemen whether it was quite honest and consistent to join heartily and readily in this interference with the manufacturers, and then, when it became a question of aiding the tenant-farmers, who, through the competition for land were just as much at the mercy of the proprietors as were the workmen at the mercy of the manufacturers, to turn round and declaim against the wickedness of interfering with “freedom of contract?” Were they quite honest, moreover, in saying that they did not so interfere in this Bill? Its advocates were for ever saying that although the Bill was permissive, landlords would not like to contract themselves out of it when it was once passed. They would be ashamed to do so in the teeth of the public opinion in favour of what was now to be given. Well, what did that mean in plain English? That they were going to bring the weight of public opinion to bear upon freedom of contract, and to try to effect that indirectly which they had much better do directly, and in a fair, open, straightforward manner. Now, since he had placed this Amendment upon the Paper, he had been told two things from several quarters. First, that compulsion in this matter was impossible. Secondly, that it would be distasteful and injurious to landowners, many of whom would take their land into their own hands sooner than submit to it. Well, he did not believe in the “impossible” argument. He had seen so many things happen which had been deemed “impossible” and things had gone on just as well. Of course, it was impossible to legislate for every case, or to provide for every detail in dealing with such a subject as that before them; but when once they had settled the general principles on which they thought the occupation of land should be based, and upon which compensation should be given, it was no more impossible to say it “shall” than to say it “may” be based thereupon. And his main objection to this Bill was that, having declared what those principles should be; having told the tenant-farmers of England that there was something which the existing law did not give them, but which they ought in justice to have—having defined that something and dangled it before their eyes—it then turned round and said—“You shall not have it unless your landlords in every case agree.” To his mind such a course was directly calculated to create discontent, to disunite landlord and tenant, and to give rise to an agitation which might eventually not be appeased by such a concession as would be deemed sufficient at the present moment. But why should compulsion be injurious—and if not—why distasteful to landowners? If it was distasteful, and if its effect would be to induce landowners to farm their own lands, he was not sure that such a result would be entirely unfortunate. There were many who thought that the severance of the ownership and the occupation of land was by no means desirable, and that laws which would tend to reduce the extent of that severance would be wise and good laws. But however that might be—as a matter of fact, although some gentlemen might take into their own hands land near to their residences, the truth was that the amount of capital required to farm land was so considerable, and the risks of a gentleman farmer so many and so great, that he was not all afraid that the mild measure of compulsion now under discussion would have the supposed effect to any appreciable extent. But—whether distasteful or not—how could it be said that it would be injurious to landowners? So far as rents were concerned, that would certainly not be the case. Let it be well understood that compensation for improvements and increased security of tenure, meant higher rents. That was a certain and undeniable fact. If he (Mr. Knatchbull-

Hugessen) let his land to a tenant who was subject to a six months' notice, and who was obliged to leave in and on the land, for his (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's) benefit for that of the succeeding tenant, all improvements which he might make, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) could not expect so high a rent as he should obtain if the notice was extended to one year or two years, and the tenant had secured to him compensation for his improvements. It was plain, therefore, that they would have higher rents under a system of compulsory compensation, and they would not have long to wait for them. So much as regarded any fears which might be entertained on behalf of the landlords. But would a permissive measure satisfy the tenant-farmers? He would only quote one authority, that of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who was one of their most faithful advisers. Speaking at a meeting of the Farmers' Club, at Salisbury Square, reported in The Times, April 6th, 1875, Mr. Read showed his ideas upon the present state of things in the following words. He said—

"A short time since he saw a lease which had just been signed. . . . He (Mr. Read) went through the lease with the farmer, and of all the monstrous and humbugging restrictions upon farming he ever knew these were the worst. The tenant happened to have a lease of the year 1800, and, except that the rent in 1875 was about double what it was before the wording of the lease was exactly the same. It was quite time that these restrictions in leases were done away with, and all that could be said for them was that he did not think they were ever enforced, or, indeed, ever thought of, by landlord or tenant."

But on May 4th, at a meeting of the same body, he thus spoke on compulsion—

"He most cordially agreed with the eloquent Professor (Professor Fawcett) in his views as to the necessity for a compulsory measure. . . . But he was one of those who, if they could not get all they wanted, would take what they could get."

Let the country gentlemen mark these and the following words—

"As it seemed the fashion to have permissive legislation, this might be taken, and a future Parliament asked to make it compulsory. . . . The present state of things was that half the farmers of England were holding their farms on a six months' notice to quit without any agreement for unexhausted improvements."

Then, as might have been expected, there was a Resolution passed as follows:—

"This club also desires to express its conviction that any legislative measure which unsettles the existing relations of landlords and tenants, and does not, at the same time, fix them upon a secure and uniform basis, is more likely to prove injurious than beneficial to the great body of tenants holding from year to year."

Thus much for the opinion of the tenant-farmers! And, now, a few words as to the wording and intention of his Amendment. He had heard it objected to as being double-edged, intending to catch the votes both of those who desired a better Bill, and those who desired no Bill at all. For his own part, he thought that rather a merit than an objection. If he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) wished to knock down a wall, he did not stop to inquire whether those who helped him were persons who desired that there should be a better wall built in its place, or that the wall should be destroyed altogether. He wished to knock down the wall of permissive legislation. If no legislation was required, permissive legislation was too much. If legislation was required, permissive legislation was too little. Those who objected to legislation could hardly refuse to condemn that species of legislation which was avowedly only accepted as an instalment, and which could not be considered as a final settlement of the question. Those who desired legislation could hardly be satisfied with that which apparently gave something with one hand which it actually took away with the other, and which could only possibly be accepted as a stepping-stone to something else. He feared it was strictly true that whilst this Permissive Bill would give to nobody an advantage which he could not obtain without it, it would unsettle the relations between landlord and tenant from one end of the country to the other. It would create expectations which it would fail to satisfy, and it would disturb a condition of things which it would do nothing to re-settle upon a surer basis. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) spoke as a landowner—nine-tenths of all that he possessed came from the land, and he was not anxious to injure the class to which he belonged. But he believed that a compulsory enactment upon this question, based upon clear and sound principles, would work the very reverse of injury. Moreover, he could not shut his eyes to the state of the whole question of land and land laws in England at that moment. He saw much land in the country urgently requiring the expenditure of capital upon it, and plenty of capital ready to come to it, but that our land laws—our laws of entail and settlement—prevented the one from reaching the other. Could such a state of things be either satisfactory or permanent? England was in a peculiar position as regarded her land. The surplus lands were in her distant colonies; but over those surplus lands she had long ago relinquished her control. But the surplus population was here at home, rapidly increasing in numbers and intelligence. That population consisted mainly of persons who were not landowners, and to whom our land laws held out little hope that they ever would be landowners. Did not the House think that, among that population, many of whom had been, by recent legislation, newly endowed with a share of political power, there were many who regarded with something akin to envy that comparatively small class which owned the land of the country? Did they not suppose that they—the landowners were narrowly and jealously watched as to the manner in which they discharged those duties entailed upon them by the possession of land? And, now, that the Government had called special attention to the matter of land tenure, was it not probable that the landless part of the population would consider the question as well as they—the House of Commons—and that there might arise within their breasts thoughts and feelings with regard to the interest of the general community in the soil of the country which might, one day, clash somewhat rudely with their ideas of the sacred rights of property? They might call this a visionary fear, and tell him that it was founded upon revolutionary and Communistic theories. But he would tell them respectfully, but boldly, that they could not get rid of an idea by calling it revolutionary, neither could they demolish a theory by applying to it the term Communistic. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) did not know why the Government had initiated this legislation. Perhaps it was at the behest of that noble Colleague of theirs (Lord Derby), usually reputed so wise and cautious, who had made a statement so opposed to wisdom and caution, as to the capacity of the land of England of doubling its present production, which, more than anything else, had forced this question forward. Perhaps, there were other reasons. There might have been hustings' pledges to redeem, and election promises to fulfil, and Her Majesty's Ministers might have desired to appear again upon the political stage in their old character of "the farmer's friends." But if they had nothing better than this Bill to give to the tenant-farmers of England, he believed that they would appear in that character, as the play-bills said—"Positively for the last time." There was one thing, however, which he would venture to tell the Government and their supporters. They could not trifle with questions of this kind. They had invited legislation upon land questions, and that legislation would not stop with this Bill. It was land tenure to-day, it would be the laws of entail and settlement to-morrow. Public opinion would force them forward upon the path which they had entered. Well, then, what was the duty and the interest of the landowners in such a position as the present? Their duty and their interest both pointed in the same direction. Their duty and their interest alike dictated that they should ascertain without delay what it was that justice demanded should be given to the tenant-farmers; what it was that was demanded by the interest of the State in the development of the productive powers of the land, and, having ascertained this, that they should give it freely, give it outright, and not permit any one tenant to be deprived of it by the caprice of any one landlord, sheltering himself behind the specious plea of the sacred right of freedom of contract. It was their interest to settle this question, either by this Bill or by some other Bill, so that they might weld together in one harmonious agreement the owners and occupiers of land, and show to public opinion that they were anxious to meet and satisfy those demands the justice of which Her Majesty's Government had admitted by inviting them to legislate. If they shrunk from this, if they whined and protested against that compulsion which was necessary to make their legislation uniform and equal, they would only interpose a delay which must be unwise and which might be dangerous. But if they now acted vigorously in the matter, and gave justly and generously what was asked, he believed their legislation would not be in vain. They would stimulate the productiveness of the soil, they would encourage the application of capital to the land, and whilst they would cement the bond of union which happily prevailed between their tenants and themselves, they would justify before the people their position as the privileged owners of the soil, they would immeasurably strengthen that position, and they would add one more element of stability to the constitution of England. When he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had placed his Amendment upon the Paper he had fully intended to have taken the sense of the House upon the question of compulsion. He had, however, received advice from various friends to which he was bound to listen. It had been represented to him that many hon. Members would not consider its permissive character to be the principle of the Bill. It might be considered that its principle was the giving of compensation to the tenant-farmer for unexhausted improvements, although that compensation might not be given in the best possible manner. If this were the case a division at the present stage might not be the best way of advancing the principles which he advocated. He would therefore forbear to move his Amendment at the present stage, but would place words upon the Paper which would fairly raise the question of compulsion in Committee.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he desired to make a few observations upon this question, which possessed no little interest to himself and those whom he represented. He would not follow the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down into those Communistic and revolutionary doctrines to which he had referred; but he thought it would be a misfortune to allow some of the fallacies to which they had listened to remain uncontradicted. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman of one thing—that those, at least, who sat upon the Ministerial side were not to be deterred from doing what they believed to be just and right to-day from the fear of any ultimate consequences which might happen to-morrow. The Bill which was now under consideration, and the subject to which it referred, had of late, no doubt, given rise to many considerable discussions beyond the walls of Parliament; and therefore he thought it, perhaps, might not be out of place if the House were to consider for a moment the grounds upon which legislation of this kind, generally speaking, had been demanded. As a justification for that demand, he thought it might be stated that much of the soil of this country was very ill-farmed; that it produced, in consequence, nothing like what it might and ought to produce; and that for that state of things the non-employment of capital to a sufficient extent in its cultivation was mainly responsible; and again that the cause of that absence of capital was to be found in the present state of the law, which did not afford to the tenant the substantial security which he ought to enjoy. There was, no doubt, a great deal of truth in these allegations. He believed that the necessity for legislation was not so great or so urgent as had been represented. The public feeling in its favour had been very much overstated. There were, beyond doubt, many districts and some counties in England where nothing of the kind was required. But, at the same time, it must be remembered that there were many other parts of this country which were not equally favoured, and where from some cause or another—partly, no doubt, owing to the absence of sufficient security—the cultivation of the soil was not creditable either to landlord or to tenant, and did not produce anything like what it might be made to do with profit. He said with profit, because some loose statements had been made, and high authorities had been quoted, to the effect that with proper security and adequate application of capital the produce of the soil might be doubled, or even trebled. Now it might very likely be true that by an unlimited outlay, if you thought fit to do so, that you might double or treble, or possibly even quadruple the produce, but then the question arose, How far would it pay you to do so? and what the tenant-farmers had to consider was this, not what was the greatest amount which the soil could be made to produce for the benefit of the consumer, but what was the greatest amount they could hope to obtain with a reasonable hope of profit to themselves. Putting aside altogether these high-flown notions of the increased amount of production which might result from Parliamentary action, he was himself of opinion that some legislation was very desirable, and believed that a well-considered and business-like Bill on the subject would result in the development and improvement of agriculture throughout the country, to the advantage of all the parties concerned. High farming could not in these days be conducted without great outlay on the part of the tenant; no tenant was justified in such an outlay unless he received sufficient security for his capital; and it was, moreover, as much for the interest of the proprietor as for the interest of the tenant that this security should be forthcoming. Regarding the question in this light, he could honestly say he heard with very great satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government had made up their minds to deal with the question, and it was with proportionate regret that he witnessed the opposition of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Knatchbull-Huguesen). From the Amendment he should have inferred either that his right hon. Friend was opposed to all legislation, or else that he desired to see legislation of a compulsory character. He gathered, however, from his speech that it was the latter of these propositions which met with his right hon. Friend's approval. He was sorry to say he could not agree at all with his right hon. Friend. He should have thought it would be a sufficient answer to his right hon. Friend to say that to suspend freedom of contract in a country like this, especially in their business relations between any two classes of the community, was an evil which ought at all times to be avoided, unless there existed a serious necessity for taking such a step. Without denying that occasions might arise when to suspend freedom of contract would be a necessary evil, he maintained that this was certainly a measure which ought not to be lightly adopted. Besides, his right hon. Friend had altogether failed to-night to make out a case for compulsion. With the experience we possessed, it was difficult to comprehend on what grounds his right hon. Friend's propositions could be seriously brought forward. They had heard a great deal about the Lincolnshire custom, which had been found to work by experience remarkably well, and which practically governed all the relations between landlords and tenants in that part of the country. But that custom, which possessed the whole force of law in that part of the country, was only permissive, and, in that respect, stood on precisely the same footing as the Bill which his right hon. Friend condemned, and Lincolnshire stood by no means alone. Similar customs existed in Nottinghamshire, in Yorkshire, to his own knowledge, and in many other counties. Now, all these customs were wholly permissive, and he could not see why, if customs which were permissive answered so remarkably well in many parts of the country, a Bill which was likewise permissive should be a disastrous failure in every other part of the country. Why was this Bill to be a dead letter? When he heard it scouted and talked of as being nothing but waste paper, he wished to know whether those who made such remarks could deny that we were making a great, nay, even an enormous concession—though he admitted it was but a just and righteous concession—when by a stroke of the pen we reversed the whole presumption of law, and created on the part of the tenant a right to, and a property in, everything which he put into and left in the land, and which, though it now belonged to the landlord, would in future belong to himself. After we had done so much for the tenant, even if his landlord should be foolish enough to ask him to do so, what was there to induce the tenant to enter into any agreement that would deprive him of the substantial benefits which the Bill was intended to confer? The measure was for the mutual benefit of both, and they were both of them perfectly well aware of that fact, and when his right hon. Friend said that a contrary state of things under this Bill would always prevail, he must be pardoned for remarking that his right hon. Friend assumed that the tenants and landlords throughout the country were fools, and that the landlords were knaves into the bargain. He would now make a few remarks with regard to the measure itself. First, with respect to the announcement made this evening by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, he thought it was satisfactory as far as the first and second class of improvements were concerned. With regard to the third class of improvements, which were divided into artificial manures and feeding stuffs, there was one alteration which he thought ought to be made. In his opinion, compensation for artificial manures and for feeding stuffs ought not to be given on the same scale, because in regard to the latter the tenant recovered half the outlay by the increased value of the animals which used them. Again, in the 35th clause he found a provision by which, under certain circumstances, a tenant was to receive his compensation only by instalments. This provision was exceedingly hard and injurious to the tenant, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would devise some way of altering it on a future occasion. As regarded the 42nd clause, extending the notice to quit, he confessed this was a matter on which he had always held a most decided opinion. He objected altogether to extending the notice to quit from six months to 12 months. If the Bill were a good Bill, as he believed it to be, additional security was wholly unnecessary; if it were a bad Bill, the additional security was not nearly sufficient. Six months notice to quit had always been the custom in the county of Lincoln, and it had been found to answer remarkably well. The effect of extending the notice to quit to 12 months would be that the farm, in 99 cases out of 100, would be left in a condition from which it could not recover for two or three, or even three or four years. He was heartily glad the Government had brought in the Bill and made an honest and statesmanlike attempt to deal with a question which had lately attracted much public attention. It was in that spirit that he hoped it would be received by the House—it was in that spirit in which it would be met by the country—and it was because he believed it would have the effect of developing and improving the condition of agriculture throughout the country that he should cordially support the second reading.

MR. LOWE said, the First Lord of the Treasury, in introducing this Bill, did not give any reason why he brought it in. The right hon. Gentleman represented it to the House as a Bill consisting mainly of compulsory compensation for improvements to be made by landlords to tenants, and also as a Bill to maintain freedom of contract. Such was the sketch given by the right hon. Gentleman of his own measure. If that were a perfectly correct sketch of the Bill, he thought nothing would be easier than to demonstrate its futility in one sense or its unfairness in another. He thought it would be eminently unfair to pass a Bill stating that, in the opinion of Parliament, such and such a thing ought to be done, without Parliament taking upon itself the responsibility of making it compulsory. If this were the correct view of the Bill, it would be open to very grave objections indeed. But there was another view which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to take of the Bill, and which, in his opinion, was equally objectionable. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that it might be a right and a good principle that we should force upon landlords in general the giving of compensation for unexhausted improvements. Now, such a measure, taken by itself, must be either futile or unjust. It was unjust if it imported a new term into a lease or a contract which was entered into between the two parties; it was futile if it endeavoured to insert a new term in a contract in which both parties were perfectly free. In other words, if they insisted upon putting into a lease a compulsory term that the landlord should give compensation to the tenant for unexhausted improvements, that landlord would certainly take care that he himself was compensated in rent for what he thought he would lose in the other direction. Therefore, such relief offered to a tenant was nugatory, for what he gained on one side he was certain to lose on the other. If, then, this Bill was what its introducer described it to be—namely, a Bill in which we legislated with one hand and took away that legislation with the other by means of freedom of contract—he thought it would be an unjust or a futile Bill. But he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had done justice to the provisions of his measure. He had risen to speak, although very little competent to deal with the greater part of the question, in order to show what seemed to him would be the result of this measure. The Bill did not apply to existing tenancies at all; where there were leases it did not apply, and of course it never would apply, because when a lease came to an end two or three words inserted in the new lease would exclude its operation. Therefore, as far as leases go, the Bill was entirely out of the question. The sole point in this Bill was its application to tenancies-at-will, and with reference to them it had a very serious application indeed. There was an important clause in this Bill which lengthened the notice to be given to the tenant from six months to a year. Then what the Bill said was this—

"That after the expiration of the first complete year of the tenancy which shall have expired after the passing of this Act, the tenancy-at-will shall be a new tenancy with a twelve months' notice."

Look at what position the landlord would be in at the end of that period. He would have fastened upon him a compulsory clause for compensation for tenants' improvements, with all the vexatious details which were necessarily attendant. Besides that, he would have fastened upon him the necessity of giving double the time of notice he was compelled to give before. These things were not only grievous to the landlord, but they would work into each other. When the landlord and tenant were in dispute about unexhausted improvements the great length of notice required must give considerable advantage to the tenant, while at the same time the annoyance to the landlord was increased. That was the position in which the landlords would find themselves if the Bill passed into law at Michaelmas, 1876. Now, what would the landlord, under such circumstances, do? Would he go on with the tenancy from year to year? It was to his (Mr. Lowe's) mind clear that the landlord would not, and that the effect of this Bill would be to drive the landlords, many of them against their will, to give up the present tenure from year to year, and have recourse to leases. A great many persons thought this would be an improvement. He was not arguing that point. He was pointing out the effect of this Bill, which was supposed to give compensation to the tenant—a feature which could easily be got rid of by a clause in the lease. The real effect of the Bill would be to abolish the tenancy from year to year. That was a very serious matter. He ventured to ask for whose benefit was this to be done? Was it for the benefit of the landlord? No, it was not, for it was competent for the landlord now to put an end to the tenancy from year to year, and give the tenants leases. There was, therefore, no enabling power wanted so far as the landlords were concerned. The landlord was a very considerable loser by the tenancies from year to year. In some parts of the country with which he was acquainted land was very considerably underlet. The landlord was surrounded by neighbours, and something was due to good-fellowship with those whose families had lived on the land as long as his ancestors. Something was due to indolence, to the intense dislike of the annoyance of changing the old system, and something was due to a wish to preserve political influence, and to a desire to live on good terms with neighbours, and to be well thought of and spoken of. All this had combined to make landlords tolerate and go on with this system of underletting. This system was the creation of the Courts of Law some 200 years ago, when men wished to have a tenure which would not require lawyers to settle the terms, and it had answered the expectations of landlords and tenants to a great degree. It was quite clear the change was not to be made for the sake of the landlord. Then, was it for the sake of any great or abstract principle? Was there anything wrong in tenancy from year to year, that they should load it with penalties, so as to drive people out of it? He held this to be the falsest of all legislation, and he, for one, entirely objected to it. He was not going into the question of freedom of contract; but he thought it unwise, where the thing was perfectly innocent in itself, to try to put it down merely because parties not concerned in it thought they could do better in some other way. It was this meddling in a shallow, interfering spirit which made legislation objectionable, and even mischievous and contemptible. Though there might be an opinion that the Scotch system was better, or that other systems were better still, it was a subject to be worked out as things had hitherto been worked out between the parties principally concerned. Their interest was that the land should yield the best return it could, and he thought they had much better be left alone, unless they were doing something palpably wrong or something injurious to public policy. The third case remained—Was this for the interest of the tenant? It was put forward as in the interest of the tenant. Now, look at what would be the inevitable result if the Bill was carried into law. At Michaelmas in 1876 the landlord would be burdened with the onerous conditions already described; he would find himself singled out for burdens which were imposed on no one else, and he would say—"I will no longer submit to these burdens which Parliament has devised; I will get out of it by giving leases." Was that all? Did they suppose that the landlord would submit to the trouble of putting all his tenants under leases, of altering the system which had been adopted in his family for 100 years, and take nothing for his pains? These lands were very much underlet, and the landlord would say it was impossible the rents which existed under a tenancy from year to year could remain the same if he was to give a lease for a number of years. The effect of this Bill and the end of all the professions of friendship for the tenant would be this—that rents would be considerably raised, and the tenants now holding on easy terms would be considerably impoverished. This would be the necessary result of the measure they were asked to pass. It was because he felt this strongly that he ventured to go out of his own sphere to put his views before the House. He maintained that the great effect of this measure was limited to tenancies from year to year, and the weight of it would fall entirely on the tenants who now hold from year to year; and on this point, having been brought up in early life among farmers, he thought he knew something of their feelings. He ventured to lay this proposition down, that there was no contingent benefit so brilliant as to recommend a farmer to a rise in his rent. Next to that, because it necessarily implied it, there was nothing a farmer held in so great a horror as a re-valuing of his holding. These were the two things which they were going to accommodate the farmers with by way of making them happy, and establishing good-will between them and their landlords. The Bill, in fact, would force landlords, by the two clauses requiring a year's notice instead of six months, and compensation for unexhausted improvements, to give up yearly tenancies at rents comparatively low, and to substitute leases; and as regarded tenants, it would raise their rents and destroy the tenancies under which they had lived happily and comfortably for generations. He thought this Bill, so far from allaying agricultural discontent, must greatly increase it.

MR. PELL said, that the House had been ably addressed by two hon. Gentlemen who were connected with counties in which the custom of tenant right existed—namely, Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire. He would ask those hon. Members, whether, in their opinion, the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was well-founded in his apprehension that the introduction and operation of the custom would have the effect of raising rents. For his part, he was not aware that rents were higher in the two counties he had named than they were in counties in which the custom did not exist. But custom was of slow growth; and, in his opinion, Her Majesty's Government had taken a wise and prudent course in proposing to step in and endeavour to supply an existing want. As far as he was able to judge, their proposals had given satisfaction to the tenant farmers of the country. What was wanted was freedom to the landlord to enter into an agreement with his tenant which should be binding upon all comers. The misfortune of the present law with respect to limited owners was that any agreement they entered into was binding only as against themselves, and was not binding upon purchaser or mortgagee. A charge even for permanent improvement fell solely upon the personal property of the limited owner. The Bill, however, would enable a landlord to agree with his tenant as to certain improvements of a permanent nature, the charge for which would fall upon the estate and not upon the personal property of the landlord. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) said, he was in favour of compulsory legislation, and intimated that he would endeavour to embody his views in a practical form in Committee. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would do so, and he had no doubt he would find that any effort to make the Bill compulsory would fail in England as it had already failed in Ireland. As long as rent was an open question, any attempt in the direction of compulsion must fail. Suppose that a compulsory clause were inserted in the Bill, and became law, what would be easier than for a landlord to say to his tenant—"You can have your farm for nine years at £1,000 a-year for the first eight years and £3,000 for the ninth if you avail yourself of the compulsory clauses of the Act; if you do not, the rent for the ninth year will be £1,000." To his mind it was quite obvious that compulsion would not do. It would involve a valuation by a Government valuer, or someone else, who would fix the rent and convert the landlord into a mere rent-charger. He deprecated much of the discussion on this subject which had been carried on during the winter by hon. and learned Gentlemen and other Members of that House, and he challenged them to try and put their notions into a practical form. Do not let them rest with endeavouring to propound to simple-minded men coming out of the country ideas of law and legislation and political economy which he believed could never be reduced to practice. The effect was to unsettle the mind of the tenant farmer, and to lead him to believe that his landlord was not willing to enter into fair conditions with him, but rather entertained a wilful desire to keep, so to say, the whip hand of the tenant's capital. The House had been told that capital was kept off the land—that all that was wanted was a large expenditure of capital in the cultivation of the land. Well, he had cultivated land as a tenant for many years, and for a man of moderate means had some considerable stake in its cultivation, and he ventured to say that what he and tenants like himself endeavoured to do was, not to keep as large a capital as they could upon the land, but just as much only as would bring them the best return for their money. He asked hon. Members to consider whether there were many tenant farmers in England who had a surplus of capital which they were desirous of placing on the land. For his part, he did not think that tenants would better their position by diverting some of their capital from the cultivation of the land and devoting the money to its purchase. The return they obtained for the cultivation of the land was, perhaps, 8 per cent, while the landowner had to be content with 3 or 3½ per cent—[An hon. MEMBER: 2 per cent.]—in many cases, 2 per cent; and a co-partnership, in which one partner obtained 2 or 3 per cent, and the other 8 per cent,

was not an unsatisfactory one, at all events for the latter. One reason why they could not expect much surplus capital to be invested in land was that better investments could be found. Cultivation was found at its best where there were no other industries competing with it, as in Norfolk. In counties where there was no other industry but the cultivation of the land there was the best mode of cultivation, whilst in counties where there were many other industries the cultivation was of the worst kind. As one interested in the cultivation of land, he expressed his thanks for this measure. He did not believe that landlords would be eager to contract themselves out of the Bill. He happened to hold two farms—one under lease and another under yearly tenancy—and he believed that his landlord would be glad to avail himself of this Bill. If he wanted a cottage built, his landlord would be very likely when this Bill was passed to tell him to build it himself. If a few hundred pounds were wanted for draining, his landlord would probably recommend him to do that also. So far from landlords being anxious to contract themselves out of the Bill, they would, he believed, be anxious to keep within its limits. It was, however, important to know whether either landlords or tenants would have the power to contract themselves out of a part of the Bill, leaving all the other parts intact. It should be, if possible, left to the landlord and tenant to make an agreement as to particular items, and when it was agreed that no claim should be made for those items, that the Act should operate in other respects. He trusted that as little time as possible would be spent over this preliminary discussion, and that the House would go into Committee on the Bill.

MR. W. C. CARTWRIGHT said, he thought that the cardinal principle of the Bill—that substantial security should be given to the tenant, was one that was most desirable. It was another question, however, how far the provisions in the Bill would carry out the principle so as to make the Bill acceptable to both parties. The Bill was brought in to alter the assumption that all improvements effected in land should belong to the landowner, and a Bill of this kind should be based upon a few simple principles, and should be elastic so that it could be applied to the country at large. If, however, they went into details, then the Bill could not be applied to all the various circumstances which existed in different parts of the country. Great care also should be taken to avoid terms that might be ambiguous and which would lead to misapprehension and misconception between the landlord and the tenant. He thought that the Bill erred upon both these points. The Bill mixed up two matters that should have been kept separately — namely, the operations that came within the ordinary course of cultivation and those which had nothing to do with the cultivation, but rather with the improvement of the soil, and anything that encroached upon the duties hitherto performed by the owner might create anomalies which, as in the case of Ireland, would require to be remedied by exceptional legislation. The House had heard from the Prime Minister that the "letting value" was to be removed out of the Bill. He had not, however, been able to satisfy himself whether it was to be entirely removed, or whether it was not still to be retained as a gauge and test of the compensation to be given in the larger class of operations. In the latter event, it would be very likely to operate against the end and aim of the Bill, which was to secure fair and equitable compensation to the tenant for what he might have put in the soil, but of which he had been unable to reap the benefit in consequence of the determination of his tenancy. If letting value was to be retained as the measure on certain improvements, then this difficulty would arise. Collateral circumstances might improve or deteriorate the letting value; and in the latter event a tenant who had sunk a great deal of capital in the land could get no compensation because there was no improvement in the letting value. According to the Bill the second class of improvements might be undertaken by the tenant of his own will and discretion, and all that was reserved to the landlord was the power to make a note either in his memory or otherwise of what was done. The landlord might go down and see how, perhaps, a young and theoretic farmer was doing what might prove of permanent mischief to his property, and would not have the slightest power to stop the mischief. That was an invasion of the rights of property which could hardly recommend itself to Members on either side of the House. Well, then, if the question of the letting value was brought into the Bill or retained in it, it would be likely to militate against the end and scope of the Bill, which was relief to the tenant. If the provision with regard to the second class of improvements was retained the inevitable consequence would be that to the majority of landlords the Bill would be a dead letter, because they would immediately contract themselves out of it. Was it wise, he asked, to pass a Bill with such provisions in it? He would advise Her Majesty's Government to reconsider this matter; but he did not think it for the interests of either landlord or tenant that the measure should be suspended for another year, and that the country should be subjected to a declamatory agitation in the meantime.

MR. M'COMBIE, speaking from a practical Scotch farmer's point of view, could say this Bill would do no harm — therefore it would do no good to oppose it. It gave nothing to the tenant-farmers, but it took nothing from them. In his humble opinion, it was one of the most innocent Bills ever brought before that House. But what they had to do was to judge of the Bill before them. There was no doubt the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) who introduced the Bill to the other House would give his previous consent in writing to his tenants for compensation in respect for improvements in the first, second, and third classes in the Bill. But who would follow his good example? Not one in a hundred. Why, their proprietors laughed at the very idea of giving their written consent for the payment of improvements to which they were entitled by law on the bankruptcy of the tenants, or on the termination of their leases. The tenant farmers at present could not even move the materials of the buildings they had erected — all went to the proprietor. That was an every-day occurrence in Scotland: without a compulsory clause the Bill was a dead letter. He thought the classification of improvements had not been drafted by a practical farmer. They were very badly arranged, some being in the second class that ought to be in the first. He would refer to two — namely, undissolved bones and liming. Instead of seven years, undissolved bones it was well-known took 40 or 50 years to dissolve themselves in the land. They should have been at the very top of the first class; and lime did not exhaust itself in less than 20 years. Drainage, if properly executed, ought to be almost permanent. Then they had the erection and enlargement of buildings. Instead of 20 years, they all knew that well-built barns and cottages would be but little worn in 50 years. Then they had bridges. He knew bridges hundreds of years old, and as substantial as the day they were built. They had fences; their stone walls were permanent. Then came the reclamation of waste land; the advantages would only be coming into full operation in 20 years. Speaking as a Scotch tenant farmer, and knowing the opinion of the farmers of Scotland in regard to this Bill perhaps better than any Member of that House, and as a duty he owed to his constituents, he must take that opportunity of informing the Government and their supporters of the universal opinion entertained of them by tenant farmers of Scotland, and it was this—that the Government and hon. Gentlemen opposite wished to give nothing, and were fully resolved to give nothing, for the relief of their grievances. They might well observe that the tables were fast turning against the landlord's interests. An offer could scarcely be obtained for farms of an inferior land with us, even at a reduction of rent, and for 10 or 20 applicants they had for such farms six years ago, now it was difficult to find one. If the price of labour continued, as there was every prospect, instead of the tenant farmers having to bow, scrape, cringe, and be the humble servants of the landlords, the landlords would have to come down. They would have to alter their overbearing conduct; they would have to relax the tyrannical conditions of their leases; and they would have to submit to reductions of rent. The House might depend upon it they were fast drifting to that state of matters. With them it had fairly begun. Their best farms would always let; but the farms of bad land must go out of cultivation, or the proprietors must take them into their own hands. But before he sat down he must inform the Government what their tenant farmers thought of their Bill—they thought it unworthy of notice, and viewed it with contempt.

COLONEL BRISE thanked the Government for bringing in the Bill, which he believed would be highly appreciated by the tenant farmers of the country. He thought that legislation was necessary to meet exceptional cases in which great hardships were suffered. The law now gave many improvements to the landlord to which he had really no moral right. This Bill would put custom in force uniformly where custom now prevailed. There were many varieties of custom in the Midland Counties. He had had experience both as an outgoing and incoming tenant, and he had always been paid for outlay in manures on root crops in the last year of his occupation. This, however, was not always the case, and the custom was not to have root crops in the last year of a tenancy, but to have a long fallow. That was a great disadvantage to the country, especially in instances which he had known comprising one-fourth of the tenant's occupation. He had been practically compensated as a farmer by long leases and low rents, and the Legislature, in introducing this Bill, had done it to meet exceptional cases. He thought security of tenure was the best compensation that could be given to tenants, for with it they could best compensate themselves. If the system of leases prevailed generally, they would not have felt so much the need of this Bill. The Earl of Leicester recently, in a speech, advised the farmers of Norfolk to contract themselves out of this Bill, if it ever passed into law. If they could get leases, no doubt they might do without such a Bill; but he did not know any good landlord who would object to have the provisions of this Bill inserted in his leases. He had been an advocate for very long leases, and in the early part of his life he granted them for 21 years. He had lived long enough for many of them to expire, and having outlived that time, he now granted them for only 14 years. The Earl of Leicester, in the speech he had referred to, said he had spent £250,000 on his estates in Norfolk; but he admitted that the outlay had been unremunerative, and in some respects he recommended the acceptance of this measure by the farmers, in order that they might be induced to invest their money. He also hoped and believed that they would. They did not want legislation in the general sense for improving the position of the landed interest. They did not want unnecessary laws or restrictions. The laws made to better the condition of the agricultural interest had failed to be of any advantage to them. They had derived advantage, not from the enactment, but rather from the repeal of legislation intended for their special benefit. The principle of this Bill was fairness and justice, and therefore he gave it his support. This Bill said to the tenant farmer—"Make your own terms; if you do not, we will make them for you." He should like it to be made a little more stringent. In the case of annual tenancies, the adoption of the Bill ought to be made compulsory in respect of the third class of compensations. If landlords were so arbitrary or dictatorial as to say that they would not have this or that, they ought to enter into leases, even if they were only for a very few years. If a tenant was not to be entitled to come under the Bill, there was every reason why he should have a lease for a certain number of years, in order that he might have some opportunity of reclaiming the capital he might put into the land.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL rose to move the following Amendment:—

"That the relations between landlord and tenant will not be put on a satisfactory footing by any measure which does not make it obligatory on landlords to give sufficient security to tenants either in the shape of a right to compensation for capital sunk in the soil, to be paid in the event of a determination of the tenancy, or by lease of sufficient duration."

He was encouraged in the bringing forward this Amendment by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), which defended the principle of it better than anything he could say. The right hon. Gentleman had told them how the question had been considered by that eminent man Mr. Pusey, and how he came to the conclusion that leases were all very well, and had numerous advantages, but that there were a great many men who did not desire to have leases. There had sprung up in England a system of yearly tenancies which had proved agreeable to both landlords and tenants, many of whom therefore desired to continue it; but, as the right hon. Gentleman had shown, that system of yearly tenancies was hampered by the fact that when a tenant had invested his capital in the land he was liable to eviction at short notice, and thus to the confiscation of his property. It was therefore desirable and necessary that when landlords let their lands without leases some security should be given in the shape of compensation for unexhausted improvements. The right hon. Gentleman had said the necessity of compensation for the tenant existed, but must be tempered by the necessity of maintaining the great principle of freedom of contract. But what argument had he brought forward for the maintenance of freedom of contract in this particular case? None whatever. He had simply told them it would be impossible to carry compulsory clauses because they would be repugnant to the land-owning party. There was nothing to contradict the assumption that the right hon. Gentleman did recognize the necessity either for landlords consenting that their contracts should be in the form of leases, or that the right to compensation should be an actual legal right, and not merely a permissive allowance at the will of the landlord. The Amendment he had put on the Paper had been conceived in no spirit of hostility to the Bill before the House; on the contrary, he thought that, so far as the Bill recognized the principle of compensation for unexhausted improvements, it went in the right direction, and if he could get no more he was inclined to accept the Bill as better than nothing. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), that if they got so much now they might get more hereafter—that if a permissive Bill was now passed, then the necessities of the case would probably lead to a compulsory Bill by-and-by; and he had heard nothing from the right hon. Gentleman to make him believe that he dissented from that view. He regarded the Bill in its present shape as framed for the most part in the interests of the landlord. It was a concession which the landlords of the country were willing to make, and in their hands its provisions had been so whittled away or counteracted by safeguards that it almost ceased to be a boon to the tenant. The object he (Sir George Campbell) had in view was by the most moderate means possible to give some vitality to the Bill, and to satisfy the farmers, with the least possible disturbance of the existing order of things.

He was quite sincere in that expression of moderation, and he had ventured to put his Amendment on the Paper because he thought some of the other propositions made inside that House and out of it went too far. The Bill, as it now stood, must be ineffectual in securing any considerable boon for the farmer. As to the larger class of permanent improvements, it was nothing more than a delusion and a mockery. To begin with, the farmer had no right to compensation unless, beyond and outside the Bill, he obtained the written consent of his landlord. Suppose the landlord consented, what sort of a bargain had the tenant got, then, under this Bill? It was something like "Heads I win, tails you lose." If the improvements should prove a failure—and all improvements involved some risk—the loss fell on the tenant; but if it proved a success, the principal gain would be to the landlord. The changes which the Government had announced its intention of making in regard to the letting value principle, might to some extent obviate that objection; still, this difficulty remained—that improvements, some of which, as testified by the practical Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. McCombie), might last for 50, 60 or 100 years, were all to be treated as lasting for only 20 years. What man would build a house in London on a 20 years' lease? Nobody; and it was unfair to set so short a duration on farm improvements. The tenant had to get the landlord's written consent; but if the tenant had to go through that process at all, he would probably insist on making a much better bargain than was provided for him by this Bill. Therefore, in regard to those permanent improvements, he repeated that the Bill was a mockery and a delusion. In regard to the second class of improvements, the Bill was spoiled by the fact that, in order to get the advantage of its provisions, the tenant must give written notice to his landlord. The result might be sometimes to place the landlord and tenant at variance, and thus to detract from the usefulness of the clause. The general effect of the provisions of the Bill in regard to compensation was that the minimum of compensation called for by the necessities of the case should be paid by the landlord, provided the landlord did not object. The compensation clauses were almost entirely nullified by the permission given to the landlords to contract themselves out of the Bill, which there was good reason to believe many of them would do. The practical effect of the Bill when it became law would probably be, as had been stated in "another place," that the landlords would insist on new contracts and new valuations, and the old state of things would be disturbed, and a new order of things introduced, to the profit of the landlord, no doubt, but not to the contentment of the tenants, to whom the consequence would be hard terms, onerous conditions, and increased rents. He agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. McCombie) who had said the Bill would not content the farmers, and that their last state would be worse than their first; so that such discontent would ensue as would render it impossible for this measure to be regarded as a final settlement. He admitted that, in some parts of the country, where the relations of tenant and landlord were based entirely on contract, viewing the question from the standpoint of strict political economy a great deal might be said in favour of hard bargains and high rents. Where farming was conducted strictly on commercial principles, and rent was driven to the utmost, they sometimes got higher agriculture; but he confessed that on these questions and some others he was, to a very considerable degree, Conservative. He was not anxious very rapidly to disturb the existing arrangements, which satisfied the parties even if they did not lead to higher agriculture. He should be content if they could get rid of the worst evils of the present system, and allowed improvements to be effected gradually with the consent of the parties. They must not forget what the right hon. Gentleman had so forcibly reminded them of, that through the greater part of England yearly tenancies prevailed, and the tenants were generally unprotected in regard to improvements. In some counties they were protected by leases, and in other counties, such as Lincolnshire, by a custom which gave them a legal right to compensation; but in the greater part of England it was as he had stated. The tenant was entirely dependent on the will of his landlord, and was always liable to the confiscation of his property without compensation. That constituted a social and political as well as an economical evil. It was true that landlords did not frequently evict their tenants, and it was also a fact that, thanks to the social influences prevailing in England, landlords were generally good. At the same time, there were exceptions to the rule, and sometimes even a good landlord was misled and prevailed on by political or personal feelings to do injustice to his tenants. They had had a case of the kind in Scotland. A landlord, probably not a very bad one, did evict a farmer, one of the first of his class, because he had offended him on certain public and political matters. It was a gross injustice that tenants should be liable to eviction because of political excitement. Although the confiscation of tenants' property was not the rule, yet the very liability to the exception constituted a state of insecurity which was a great and real grievance, and which Government had admitted the necessity of trying to remedy. The dependent condition of the tenant farmer was a social and political evil which ought to be removed. On grounds of public policy they ought not to allow a man to make a contract which placed him in a condition of dependence contrary to the freedom of an Englishman. He wished to apply the minimum of compulsion, but the landlord ought not to be able to escape the equitable obligation to compensate his tenant in cases of eviction. Though he proposed that it should be optional that compensation should be given in the shape of long leases, or in some other shape, he must guard himself from saying leases were alone and in themselves sufficient security. That was still an open question. Scotland, no doubt, was a more advanced country than England. ["Oh!"] Well, that was his view. Scotland being a more advanced country, they had reached there the more advanced stage of leases. But whether they were sufficient in the advanced state of agriculture was open to doubt, and he would say this, that long leases made the farmers in Scotland what they were not in England—independent men, who could hold their own with their landlords. For social, political, and economical purposes, leases were, at all events, far better than yearly tenancies unaccompanied by the right to compensation. He was not so prejudiced in favour of leases as to suppose nothing else could be satisfactory, and he was aware that in many parts of England there was a preference for yearly tenancies; but if they wished to stop agitation, they must make some concession on this question of compensation, and do something to restore the tenant-farmers to the position of free and independent Englishmen. The present system necessarily made the farmers a poor hereditary caste, and no energetic men of capital would embark in the pursuit while there were no leases and no tenant right. It was true under a commercial system of farming they had a lot of "retired tinkers and tailors," as they had been termed, who settled down as farmers, and in Scotland the sons of retired shop-keepers were often most successful farmers; but so long as the present system continued, men of energy and capital would not in general invest it in agriculture under the English system. He believed that wherever there was superior farming in England, it would be found that as a necessary condition some protection had been given to the tenant in the shape either of a lease or tenant right. What he sought by his Amendment was to put so much compulsion into the Bill as would set England generally on the same footing either as Scotland or Lincolnshire. The great objection urged to compulsory compensation was that it interfered with what seemed to be regarded as the religious principle of freedom of contract; but he contended that there were various precedents for interfering with freedom of contract, and other kinds of freedom as well, and there was a growing necessity for such interference on social and political grounds. It was a fact that the tenant farmers in many parts of England had been subjected to a tyranny—["Oh, oh!"]—he meant an economical and social tyranny—which deprived them of the character of free men and free agents, which led to discontent, and which would ultimately lead to much stronger measures than these now before the House. He asked hon. Gentlemen, therefore, to consider whether it would not be advisable to take the "stitch in time," which might "save nine," and whether it was not very likely that a small concession such as that which he suggested might content the farmers for a long time to come, and thus stop

He was quite sincere in that expression of moderation, and he had ventured to put his Amendment on the Paper because he thought some of the other propositions made inside that House and out of it went too far. It was a fact that the tenant farmers in many parts of England had been subjected to a tyranny—["Oh, oh!"]—he meant an economical and social tyranny—which deprived them of the character of free men and free agents, which led to discontent, and which would ultimately lead to much stronger measures than these now before the House. He asked hon. Gentlemen, therefore, to consider whether it would not be advisable to take the "stitch in time," which might "save nine," and whether it was not very likely that a small concession such as that which he suggested might content the farmers for a long time to come, and thus stop agitation, and effect that which the Bill of the Government certainly would not do.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the relations between landlord and tenant will not be put on a satisfactory footing by any measure which does not make it obligatory on landlords to give sufficient security to tenants either in the shape of a right to compensation for capital sunk in the soil, to be paid in the event of a determination of the tenancy, or by lease of sufficient duration,"—(Sir George Campbell.)

—instead thereof.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to say a few words on this question. In Mr. Pusey's Committee, so far from a lease being considered an equivalent for tenant right, the strongest got-up evidence—that which was undoubtedly prepared and got up by large associations of persons—was to the effect that tenant right was more needed under a lease than where there was no lease. Therefore, in his opinion, the Amendment which had been moved was no answer at all to the Bill of the Government. Considering the way in which the public mind had been agitated on the subject during the last few years, he felt thankful to the Government for having, under all the difficulties of the case, brought in the present Bill. Anyone who reflected on the great variety of circumstances with which they had to deal—circumstances varying in every county and in every parish—must recognize that any general measure which was universally compulsory must work the greatest injustice to the largest number. It was impossible to frame a general Bill which would give satisfaction to all classes. The Government proposed a measure which sketched out and laid down all the great principles of tenant right that had been contended for, and nothing could be plainer or simpler than the means by which the various matters in question might be settled as easily and inexpensively as possible. To those persons who did not want a Bill the option was given to come under it or not, as they pleased. He did not see why landlords and tenants should not be allowed—as they were most competent to do—to settle their own arrangements without State interference; and he believed that if the whole of England were polled, 80 out of every 100 persons would be in favour of that view. But whilst the Bill allowed free contract, he feared that, as it was drawn, it would drive persons against their will to make fresh contracts. That, he thought, was unnecessary and unfair, and he hoped the Government would consider whether a short clause and a Schedule might not be introduced in Committee, by means of which parties who wished to keep out of the operation of the Act might do so without going to a lawyer or having stamp duty to pay. He was not one of those who hoped that any measure could be framed on this subject which would give satisfaction to everybody; but he believed the present Bill was calculated to give reasonable satisfaction and to bring to an end an agitation which had for some time threatened to lead to anything but peace.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND, who had given Notice of the following Amendment:—

"That it is desirable to consider, without further delay, the proposals now before the House for amending the Law relating to capital invested in Agriculture, with a view to pass, during the present Session, a measure which may be accepted, without reserve, as a settlement satisfactory to the classes interested in the profitable cultivation and permanent improvement of land."

said, that when he put on the Paper this Amendment upon the Motion of the right hon. Member (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), it was not with any idea that in the face of such a powerful majority as that by which the Government was supported, that Amendment would be agreed to. He wished simply to put upon record his view of the main question at issue. It had been said that this was the first effort to do justice to the tenant farmer. Had the right hon. Gentleman forgotten the Irish Land Bill? He hoped they would hear no more of that kind of talk. He would remind the House that the Protectionists and the so-called farmers' friends had stood in the way of Mr. Pusey's Bill being carried, although the right hon. Gentleman had in 1849 given the most cordial support to its principle, which was that tenants should have the right to demand compensation for unexhausted improvements. They had been told that the present Bill

came from the House of Lords, where it passed without a division; but it had been greatly altered in its passage through that House, and he ventured to predict that in the House of Commons it would be subjected to a more searching examination. The land agents and stewards were gradually teaching the landlords that they must not be unreasonable with their tenants, and the old hereditary tenants that they must move with the world; and he should be very much surprised if those gentlemen had been consulted by the Government on the subject. They were men well acquainted with every county in England, and who held a very important position between the landlord and the tenant. He was convinced that if any attempt had been made to obtain information from them the present Bill would never have been introduced. It certainly was drafted with consummate skill; but he doubted very much if the draftsman knew anything about land. The Members of the Government were all connected with land, and he was astonished at the manner in which the measure had been put before the House of Lords. It had at first been received with suspicion and distrust, and in "a nagging spirit," and as being utterly repulsive to the body of the tenantry, who looked upon it with utter scorn, but that feeling had now given way to one of indifference. The defence set up by the promoters of the measure was not that it was a good, but that it was not a bad Bill; whereas the contention of those who opposed it was that, whether good or bad, it would drive landlords into making fresh agreements with their tenants. The Bill professed to be founded on two principles—that of giving security to capital and freedom to somebody. Now, the security proposed to be given was not secure. It was entirely dependent on the will of one man. The freedom was all on one side, and that freedom, even of the landlord, was hampered by an artificial system through which the Prime Minister did not appear to see. To attempt to lay down rules in relation to the whole of this island upon principles of classification would be most objectionable. With respect to the necessity for the further investment of capital in the soil, that he believed was thrown in as a sort of rhetorical justification of the Bill. The necessity for such investment had been very much overstated. It appeared from high authority that from the time of the repeal of the Corn Laws down to the year 1872 over £10,000,000 had been invested in the land by landowners, and that since that time over £750,000 had been similarly invested under the powers provided by the present law. It had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that Mr. Pusey was the first advocate of tenant right. [Mr. DISRAELI: In the House of Commons.] Well, he believed that Lord Portman in the year 1843 introduced Bills in the House of Lords on the subject; but being opposed by country gentlemen and hereditary Peers, he had to abandon his attempt to do justice to the tenant-farmers of the country. The question was then taken up by Mr. Pusey, who advocated this principle—that no outlay or improvement by the tenant should be chargeable upon the estate without notice to the owner and his assent obtained, except cake and manuring; and his next principle was this—that, as far as possible, the amount of compensation should be defined beforehand. These were principles which he hoped Her Majesty's Government and the House would bear in mind in the consideration of this Bill, so that everything might not be left to depend upon the conflicting decisions of valuers, and that there might be no necessity for the landlord going to law with his tenants or resorting to arbitration to settle questions which ought to be settled amicably in the first instance. It should be remembered, too, that the farmer now needed time. He was allowed six months after sowing his seed; but, that he might be able to reap as well as sow, he should have, in the first instance, 18 months to get his land into condition. There were now men in this country who were speculating in land, and who wished to drive the tenants off their land in order that they might build upon it. That ought not to be encouraged. What farmers required was a certainty that they would be entitled by law to realize the capital which they had sunk in the ground. They were now between two fires—the upward tendency of wages (the possible development of agricultural unions, of which he desired to say nothing), and the increase of rent. These things made them all the more anxious that legislation should secure to them the fruit of their industry and a due return for the investment of their capital. The farmers were rather ready to follow the leading members of their body, and some of them had got the idea that when a farmer took land by contract, carried out his agreement, and made his profit, he was then entitled to turn round and say—"I have added to the value of your property, and that increased value is mine." He did not believe that the farmers of England, as a general rule, held this view or wished to see it carried out, and there should be no endeavour to transfer from the landlord to the tenant the ordinary interest in the improvement of the soil. Were the Government prepared to transfer the management from the owner to the occupier? If not, do not let them pretend to do it. Let them say plainly that the improvement of the land rested with the owner, or else prove the owners to be incapable. It was a delusion to pass this Bill in the belief that the farmers could be induced to invest their money in the permanent improvement of the soil. A farmer had sons to put in business, and daughters to marry, or he preferred to make investments of his own selection, and he wanted to get a higher profit upon his savings. Mr. Pusey was the first to speak of tenant right, but the state of affairs had changed since his time. There were more needy landlords in his day. A great deal of land had since been sold to railway companies, and had otherwise changed hands, and as landlords as a class had now more capital than they had then the ground for a modified tenant right no longer existed. He might be thought to be Communistic in his views; but if the Government thought that the landlords of England were in the destitute condition that had been represented and unable to manage their own property, let them appoint a Royal Commission to examine the matter and consider whether the Irish Land Bill was not necessary on this side of the water. A good deal of alarm had been expressed as to the exorbitant charges to be brought upon the landlords. The Government might advantageously consult the reports of the surveyors' meetings on this subject. As an example of the average allowance for cake and artificial manures they gave the following proportionate figures:—Extent of acres, 5,155;

cake, 1,500; manure, 1,400; land, labour, or fixtures, 7,250; total about 10,000. The average charge for cake was 5s. 10½d.; manure 5s. 5d.; land, labour, improvements, &c., £1 8s. 1d.; total, £1 19s. 4d., or less than £2 per acre. The average rent being £1 10s. 4d. If the Government would pass a Bill giving security to the farmers for those ordinary charges that passed between landlord and tenant in Lincolnshire, they would do a great deal of service, and remove much of the alarm that at present existed. If the truth were known, the Bill was a few weeks ago detested by hon. Members on the Ministerial benches. Since the letting value had been taken out of it, it was acquiesced in by hon. Members opposite, who now believed that the Government were about to pass a very useful measure. The practical course would be to legislate frankly about cultivation, to alter the present presumption of the law, but require obedience to its spirit, and to allow an equivalent agreement, but to legislate distinctly, firmly, and honestly. He wished the Government would explain in what position owners would be placed who had yearly agreements with full tenant-right for cultivation—a special contract for improvement and perfect freedom of cropping. It was placing landlords in a painful position when they were obliged to say to their tenants—"We must call upon you to contract yourselves out of the Bill or else we must give you notice." It was a very serious matter between landlord and tenant when these contracts became a piece of waste paper. He did not like to indulge in predictions; but the farmers were beginning to find out that this Bill tended towards re-valuation. He was told by many landlords that they intended to contract themselves out of the Bill. The whole of the House of Lords intended to do so, and a large landowner said to him—"I have no course to pursue, if this Bill passes, except to re-value all my estates, and I shall be obliged to do so." It would be a result much to be deprecated if the Bill caused a disturbance of good understanding between landlord and tenant, and if it led to harsh treatment and disrespect of the law. What the Government meant to give let them give frankly and unservedly, and let them put landlords and tenants in a position not only to accept the Bill, but to contract themselves into rather than out of it. Above all, let the Government leave both landlords and tenants the greatest freedom of contract as to the mode of carrying out the law. If the Bill were amended in the direction he had indicated, it would then become a beneficial measure.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the opposition to the Bill had taken a very curious course. When he first looked at the Notice Paper for the second reading, he found that a distinguished Member on the front Opposition bench (Mr. Knatchbull - Huggessen) intended to move—

“That permissive legislation upon the subject of Agricultural Holdings was calculated to unsettle the existing relations between landlord and tenant, without securing to either an equivalent advantage.”

The right hon. Gentleman had been kind enough to inform the House that he had framed the Amendment so as to secure the largest possible amount of support; that his object was to knock down the wall without caring whether anything was set up in its place or not. Indeed, the candour of the right hon. Gentleman was not confined to that statement, for he said he had framed the Amendment without consultation with any Party or section of a Party in the House; and he was, he must confess, surprised to hear a Member of so much experience make such a declaration with respect to an Amendment so important as that which he had announced it to be his intention to move. Looking at the result, the experiment was one which, in his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman was not likely to repeat. This Bill being confined to England, no other English Member had put down an Amendment in opposition to it, and the right hon. Gentleman had found that he must retire from the field. An Amendment had, however, been proposed in opposition to the Bill; and it was moved by an hon. Gentleman who had recently entered the House from the North of Scotland, and seconded by another who represented an Irish constituency. They might, therefore, fairly assume that the Bill had met with the general approval of the House, or, at any rate, of the English Members. [SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I did not move the rejection of the Bill.] When the hon. Gentleman had greater experience in the House he would know that if such an Amendment as his were carried the result would be that the Bill would not be read a second time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich used some very strong language against the Bill, but not so strong as the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Thomas Acland), who said the measure was received with scorn. Where did the scorn come from? The hon. Baronet certainly was scornful; but not the farmers of England. Then it was said that this Bill had been brought in not to assist but to delude the farmers; and surely to charge a Government with deliberately introducing a measure to delude its supporters was to make use of language that was scarcely within proper bounds. The hon. Baronet was, he might add, no doubt, an acute man; but the farmers of England were quite as acute and shrewd as he was, and in at least one part of England they had lately afforded a test of their feeling with regard to this Bill. The hon. Member who had recently been returned to that House for West Suffolk was returned upon the very principle upon which this Bill was founded, and the candidate who opposed him expressly challenged the opinion of the constituency upon the question whether legislation on this subject should be permissive or compulsory. His hon. Friend was returned by a majority of 1,700 odd over his opponent. He knew something of that constituency in early life. It was one in which the tenant farmers exercised a preponderating influence. When the hon. Baronet talked of their voting for their landlords he seemed to forget the Ballot Act which had been passed under the auspices of the late Government. Now, on the question of compulsory and permissive legislation there would, of course, be great difference of opinion; but he would remind the House that in a Bill, which had been brought in some time ago by Mr. Howard, though it contained a compulsory clause, still the compulsion was not absolute, because the landlord might contract himself out of its provisions by giving a lease to the tenant; and when the right hon. Gentleman opposite talked of the present measure as not being worth the paper on which it was written, he would suggest that it was somewhat absurd to suppose that the landlords, if it was passed, would at once rush to their solisubject of freedom of contract? The 12th clause of that Act declared that persons whose holdings were rated at an annual value of not less than £50 should not be entitled to make any claim for compensation under any provision of the Act in cases where the tenant had contracted in writing with his landlord that he would not make any such claim. So even a poor Irish farmer, whose valuation was £50, was declared by the framers of that Act to be sufficiently independent to make a bargain with his landlord. And yet the House was now told that the farmers of England, whose rents or valuations, he believed, were seldom so low as £50, were so dependent, so servile, that they were not to be trusted to contract themselves out of the provisions of this Bill. He really could not understand how anybody could cast such a slur upon the tenant farmers of this country. He believed this Bill would fairly and fully meet the defects now existing in our law, and that it would be acceptable to the tenant farmers of this country, and be received generally by the landlords. He also believed that it would be a means of attracting more capital to the soil, and of increasing the produce of the land.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, this question had hitherto been discussed altogether in the interests of the great landowners and the large tenant farmers. In his opinion, those two classes were quite capable of taking care of themselves. He very much doubted whether any legislation at all was necessary. He knew well the times were marching, and that we must march with them; but he thought it was questionable whether it was altogether for the interest of this country that this Bill should pass. He believed the tendency of it would be to throw the ownership and the occupation of land into fewer hands, and that, he thought, would be a great evil. There were many small resident landowners who in their districts well discharged their duties, and acted on the old principle of "Live and let live." He feared these men, finding themselves deprived of the benefits of their estates, would say that the Bill was one-sided in its operation; and there was a danger lest they might be led to say—"The best thing we can do will be to throw all these holdings into one or two large occupations;" or "We had better sell our estates to some millionaire and double our income." It was a phase of things which had occurred to M. de Tocqueville, who, in referring to the smaller class of proprietors in France, finding themselves deprived of their political importance in the country, had withdrawn themselves to the towns, spoke of the loss which France had suffered in connection with her rural population. It seemed to him that the small class of occupiers were a very valuable class of men, men of most laborious habits, who lived very hardily, and who, although not possessing much capital, made up for that by thrift and toil. He would defer what further observations he had to make till a future occasion.

MR. NEWDEGATE: As one of the few Members of the House who served on the Select Committee of 1843, I wish to make an observation or two on this Bill; and perhaps I may be permitted, in the first place, to correct the historical references of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister by stating that it was I who moved the appointment of that Committee. Now, I consider that this Bill proceeds upon the lines which were laid down in the Report of that Committee. The origin of that Committee was, that the late Mr. Pusey had brought in successive Bills in this House, but was unable to obtain the assent of the House to any of them; and the aim of all of them was to ensure compensation for the unexhausted improvements of the tenant farmer. The tendency of the feeling in this House was that no interference was necessary; and that feeling has been justified by the result, that there has been but one change of the law since the appearance of that Committee's Report, and that that change of the law was in the same sense as the recommendations of this Bill. Before the appearance of that Report the presumption of the law was against the right of the agricultural tenant to any fixtures that he might erect during his tenancy; whereas the law was in favour of the right to possession of any fixtures that might be erected by a commercial or manufacturing tenant upon commercial or manufacturing premises. In consequence of the Report of that Committee, the Emblements Act was passed, whereby the right of the agricultural tenant to the possession of the fixtures erected on their value than in England under a system of leases. The system of leases was not popular in this country. It was not popular among landlords, and he did not think it was popular among tenants. A few years ago an Act was passed enabling limited owners to grant leases. That Act had been very little used; at the same time, it was the only means by which, so far as he was aware, a limited owner could give security to a tenant for the outlay he made on land. The Act had been pretty much a dead letter, and it seemed desirable to have some machinery to give security to the tenant without the necessity of granting leases. He knew that leases were considered the summum bonum of agricultural tenure; but it was difficult to persuade either farmers or owners to adopt the system. In his own county leases were exceedingly rare, the land being held from year to year. But the improvements which had been made in the system of husbandry had necessitated fresh legislation. There was a time when the chemistry of the soil was little understood; when the mixture of the different strata on the same farm was little resorted to; when any manures beyond those made in the farm-yard were little used, and when the actual cash outlay of a tenant, except for wages, was almost nothing. The improved knowledge of agricultural chemistry, the improved style of farming, had introduced a state of things in which it was necessary to make a much larger outlay on the land, both in bringing up sub-soil on to the surface, and using artificial manures, and the farmer naturally asked how he should be expected to make that outlay if he saw no return for his money. Something had been said of hereditary landlords and hereditary tenants, where estates and farms had gone from father to son for generations. There mutual confidence supplied the place of law, and in such cases it was very rare indeed that a tenant had injustice done to him. But in other cases, there was no security to the tenant that the land would be continued in the same family; and in others, as he had pointed out, the means of limited owners did not enable them, though willing, to give security. In such cases this Bill was very necessary, and would be very advantageous, and he ventured to say it would come largely into operation. They had been told that such a Bill would do nothing unless it was compulsory; but all the argument on the other side was to the effect that a compulsory Bill would be wholly inappropriate. The hon. Baronet had ridiculed the notion of laying down Schedules or classes in the Bill for all the different subjects for which compensation should be paid, and yet he seemed to think there would be danger of parties contracting themselves out of the Bill. There were such varieties in different localities and in different circumstances of the same estate that it would be quite ridiculous to make a Procrustean rule for every case. The hon. Baronet seemed to think the Government had brought in this Bill without consulting any eminent authority on the subject of agriculture. Even among the ranks of the Government there were no mean authorities on that subject, and it was not likely that they would propose such a Bill without taking the counsel and advice of those authorities. The Bill, with certain modifications, had passed the other House of Parliament. [Ironical cheers.] The noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) seemed amazed at that observation; but he (Mr. Hunt) should have thought that the heir to a Peerage would not have been inclined to sneer at an Assembly in which he himself might yet have the honour of sitting. That Assembly certainly contained as much agricultural knowledge as could be found elsewhere, and it had passed this measure without a division. The right hon. Member for Sandwich said the Government professed freedom of contract, but freedom of contract only for the landlord. He compared the relations between the tenant farmers and the landlords of this country and the relations between labourers and their employers, and he referred to the Truck Act as an instance in which freedom of contract was infringed. He (Mr. Hunt) thought it was an insult to the tenant farmers of this country to say that they were so dependent, so ignorant, so wanting in manliness that they could not make a bargain for themselves. He believed the majority of the tenant farmers would repudiate such doctrines. He did not wish to allude to so bad a precedent as the Irish Land Act, the principle of which, he hoped, would never be extended to the other part of the kingdom. But what said the Irish Land Act on the specific contract; in fact, to contract himself out of the operation of this Act; but, in doing so, securing to his tenant adequate compensation for his outlay of capital in the improvement of the farm. I do not wish to detain the House; but these are the products of considerable reflection on the subject on my part. I should regret the result if it turned out to be such as the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Cavendish) seems to apprehend; that is, if the result of passing this Bill should be to throw the smaller properties into the market; but I own I cannot see the probability of such a result. Rather, I believe that, by inducing the owners of such properties to contract with their tenants, and giving the security to the tenant which this Bill affords, you will facilitate the retention of their properties by these small owners. It is not on large properties, generally speaking, that the hardships resulting from the eviction of tenants occur, and that the tenants will derive advantages from the measure. It is rather, in the case of small properties, purchased it may be simply as investments, and with respect to which the landlord has no sentiment but to secure the greatest possible money return. This Bill is, I think, rather ambitious in its scope and details in some respects; but I believe that Her Majesty's Government have done well in proposing it, and that the period has arrived when the system of compensation is sufficiently understood to justify their originating a measure in favour of the claim to compensation by the tenant farmer.

MR. D. DAVIES said, he was not going to oppose the Bill, although it was not exactly what he should wish to see. At the same time, the Bill came from that side of the House in which the tenant farmers had confidence—from those who were professedly the representatives of the tenant farmers—and the House ought not to be too severe on the measure. He had some experience of farmers, and had a little land of his own at the present time, for which he paid very dear. There were three classes of landlords. First, there was a large class who did not require any Act to improve their relations with their tenants; secondly, there was a class having only a limited interest in their property, and he thought this Act would do good to them. There was another class —a bad class—and he was afraid this Bill would do no good to them. It was with regard to this class that there was a feeling on his side of the House that the Act ought to have gone a little further. If landowners generally adopted the Bill there would be no necessity to make it compulsory; but probably at the next Election those who sat on his side of the House would promise the farmers to amend the Act if they were placed in power.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT said, he thought the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, having bought a little land, and being so well satisfied with the Bill, would be very much inclined to buy a little more, and then he would not despair of seeing the hon. Gentleman come over to that (the Ministerial) side of the House and stand up strongly for the rights of property. Having listened most attentively to nearly the whole of this debate, he was bound to say that he had not heard any sufficient reason given for dealing with this question. He frankly admitted that there was a certain compensation which out-going tenants ought to receive; but it should apply only to what would be of real benefit to the incoming tenant. Now the incoming tenant had hardly been mentioned during the whole course of this debate, and he of all others was the person who ought to have the most serious consideration of the House. They had heard there had been certain talk about the Bill. Every one knew where that talk came from. They knew that through the length and breadth of the land Agricultural Chambers had risen up and demanded that there should be some legislation. But he was not absolutely clear, and no one had pointed out, that Agricultural Chambers represented the views and wishes of the tenant farmers of this country. He would like to know where the gross injustice had been, where the evictions had occurred which led to the introduction of this Bill. He would ask his hon. Friends who represented especially the agricultural interest—he would ask those who were tenant farmers themselves—whether they would get up and say that evictions were rife in any portion of this country? He heard some one say "Of course, not." That he believed to be the true answer. He was glad to see the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) in his place, because he had been talking a little in Agricultural Chambers, and had been laying down the law. But what did he say? He said he would have nothing to do with the matter, unless in the interest of the general public and for the improvement and increase of produce. It had been said by a high authority that the produce of this country could be doubled. Now, he ventured to affirm there was not a practical farmer in the country who would say that, taking England through, it could be increased 20 per cent. He would go further, and say, that in a large part of the country farming was in the highest and most efficient state, and that in other parts where it was not so good 20 per cent was as much as the produce could be increased by. He could prove by statistics, if necessary, that there were certain classes of land in this country on which large sums of borrowed money had been laid out to put up agricultural buildings, where two or three farms of 100 acres each had been thrown together, and where now, taking the interest into account, the land did not pay as well as it did before when the smock-frocked farmer paid 10s. an acre for it. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) who was all in favour of small tenants, and would ask whether it was his wish or the wish of the House that small farmers should not exist? It should not be forgotten that the heavier compensation you gave to the outgoing tenant the worse you made it for the incoming. The great object was that the incoming tenant should have means to devote to the cultivation of the land; but if it was taken out of his pocket before he entered on the land, how could he have it except by borrowing? And that brought him to another argument—that the farmers would not invest their money in the soil because they had not proper security. Now, he would appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) and the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) to say if they knew one who was absolutely and solely a tenant who had not invested all his capital in the cultivation of the land. [MR. PELL: That was exactly my argument.] The difficulty in the tenant's case was, not that he did not invest his money in the soil, but that he had not got sufficient capital to invest in it. With regard to the Bill itself, looking at it as he did when it appeared first in "another place," he must say he had never seen a Bill so badly drawn. It was a Bill which seemed never to have had any regard to the condition of England at all. The First Lord of the Admiralty, who had made an excellent speech from his point of view on the subject, had said that the Bill did not intend to do away with yearly agreements. When he read it first he said that the Bill was drawn up by a Scotchman, or one who knew nothing of the manners and customs of England. Perhaps there was a little touch of the Irishman about it also. The whole tenour of the Bill then, was to exclude from its provisions all those who took leases, and bring under its provisions all those who had yearly agreements, which amounted to certainly two-thirds, if not four-fifths of the whole. The farmers of England were perfectly satisfied with a yearly tenancy, because farms were occupied from generation to generation by the same family under old landlords. Those who bought property at a moment's notice wanted to get as much as they could from it in as short a time as possible; but after a few years they found that they must go on in the same way as others in the neighbourhood, and they fell into the custom of the county. A yearly tenant in England had his land 20 per cent less than was the case in Scotland. Therefore it followed that if the question of the letting value had been allowed to remain part of the Bill, every landlord in England would have been compelled to have a complete re-valuation of his estate. He was, therefore, glad that the proposals, as to letting value, which appeared in the Bill as originally drawn had been omitted from the measure before it was submitted to the House of Commons. His right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty had tried to grapple with the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) as to the application of the Bill to yearly tenants; but he had not succeeded in demolishing the force of the arguments which been adduced by the right hon. Gentleman. He did not think the Bill would absolutely drive the country into a general system of leases; but it was clear to his mind that every man who had a yearly agreement would be compelled to enter into a fresh one, if he chose to contract himself out of the Bill. He hoped this part of the Bill would be so amended in Committee as that all landlords who had agreements with their tenants would, by that fact, be exempted from the provisions of the Bill. It was proposed in the Bill to adopt the Lincolnshire custom, but he ventured to say that all practical men would agree with him in thinking that that custom was not and could not be made applicable to the country generally. This fact seemed to have been dimly visible to the draftsman of the Bill, who had attempted to cure his error by a proposal contained in the 5th clause in the third class. This, however, was not by any means satisfactory, and he hoped the proposal would be struck out of the Bill when the Committee stage was reached. The proposals with regard to the manner in which the compensation to outgoing tenants was to be assessed, again, were not what they should be. They were by far too intricate, and ought to be so amended as that the outgoing tenant should only be compensated for such improvements as were perfectly clear and apparent to the incoming tenant, who otherwise might have to pay for that which never could be of benefit to him. What he wanted was, that the Bill should not be treated in any way as a matter of Party, but as a measure which was intended to be of real practical value to the country; that it should be just to the outgoing tenant, fair and reasonable to the incoming tenant; and, above all, that it should respect—as the measure of a Conservative Government ought to respect—the rights of private property.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Before I make any general observations on the Bill, I wish to say one or two words upon the alterations in the measure which were announced by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He has informed us that considerable alterations have been made as respects the clauses in which the principle of the increased letting value is introduced. In "another place," when the Bill was introduced, it was announced that the principle to which I am referring was not only the definition of an improvement, but also was the principle upon which the compensation for such an improvement should be assessed. Although two Members of the Government have spoken, I am still in ignorance whether the increase of letting value has altogether disappeared from the Bill, or whether it has only disappeared from the 7th clause. It is of great importance to the House to know whether the principle has disappeared from the 5th as well as the 7th clause; and if any right hon. Gentleman can inform me on that point, I shall be glad to be informed before I make any further observations upon it. It does not appear that any Gentleman is able to inform me whether the letting value is in the 5th clause or not.

MR. DISRAELI: It is taken out of the 5th clause and out of the 7th, and wherever the letting value is the basis of compensation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) when addressing the House also asked me the question. It is rather an inconvenient process to be listening to a speech and also to have questions addressed to you; and, therefore, I did not, perhaps, reply with sufficient accuracy. The letting value is omitted from the 5th and 7th clauses, and wherever it is made the basis of compensation; but the phrase "letting value" is in one clause introduced as a check.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman informs us now that it is also omitted in the 5th clause. But the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) informed the House of Lords that the increase of letting value was the "keystone of the Bill."

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the noble Lord that the House of Lords is not a proper subject of debate in this House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I must apologize if I have inadvertently transgressed the rules of debate. The principle of the increase of letting value was declared by a high authority to be the leading principle of this Bill, which we are asked to read a second time; and we are informed that it is to be omitted when we go into Committee. I should like to ask the attention of the House to the effect of this alteration. As I have said, the addition to the letting value was made the definition of an improvement.

"Where, after the commencement of this Act, a tenant executes on his holding an improvement adding to the letting value thereof, he shall be entitled, subject to the provisions of this Act, to obtain, on the determination of the tenancy, compensation in respect of the improvement."

In the 7th clause this addition is made the basis upon which compensation was to be given. I am allowed to refer to the "Votes and Proceedings of the House of Lords," and I presume I am therefore allowed to refer to the Bill as introduced into that House, and as it is now laid before us. In the course of its passage through the other House an addition was made to the 7th clause by which the compensation which the tenant might in any case obtain was limited to the amount he expended on the improvement, and, at the same time, the letting value was made the basis of compensation. Now, as we are informed, the cost has been taken as the basis of compensation, but letting value is to be retained in some shape in the Bill, and I presume it will be retained as a limitation of the compensation which, in certain cases, the tenant may obtain. The effect of the alteration announced to-night appears to be this—that the tenant is in no case to have what he had a reasonable right to expect from the Bill as it came to us from the House of Lords; that is to say, within certain limits he would be entitled to a share in the increased letting value of the holding which had been effected partly by his own exertions. ["No, no!"] That is what the tenant was entitled to expect from the Bill as it came from the House of Lords; it is not what he gets as the Bill is to come before us. Under the Bill as it stands now he will get nothing at all unless the letting value is increased; the tenant is to have all the risk and none of the advantages of the speculation. I say none of the advantages, because you cannot call it an advantage to be repaid a portion of the sum you have expended in speculation. If the speculation fails, under the Bill as now amended by the Government the tenant is to lose all his money; if it succeeds, he is to obtain only such portion as the valuer may think expedient. I want further to call attention to the manner in which these alterations have been made. We are told that the Bill has been passed unanimously by the Lords. The First Lord of the Admiralty referred, in terms of considerable exultation, to the great agricultural knowledge possessed by that body, and he seemed surprised when I gave him an ironical cheer. I entirely share his respect for the agricultural knowledge possessed by the House of Lords; but I want to point out that this Bill is not the Bill passed by the House of Lords. It is a Bill of which I have an impression—I am not permitted to say more—that the key-stone is not precisely that which was presented to the House of Lords; therefore it appears to me to be somewhat bold to present this Bill to the House of Commons as the product of the great agricultural knowledge and experience of the House of Lords. It has been passed unanimously in the shape in which it appears before us to-night; but not in the shape in which we are asked to pass it. What has happened since the Bill came to us from the other House? It has been discussed, to a considerable extent, in the country; but the discussions have not turned upon the points in which alterations have been made. The discussions in the country have turned upon the subject of the permissive or the compulsory character of the Bill. As far as my knowledge goes, very little has been said in the country about these clauses relative to the principle of the letting value, which we are informed are to be altered. What has happened to alter the decision of the Government? We have heard something—and I hope I am not out of Order in referring to it—of meetings which have been held, of more than one meeting which has been held within the walls of a celebrated building in Pall Mall; we have heard rumours of a preliminary meeting which was held in Pall Mall, at which considerable objection was taken to the principle of the letting value as embodied in this Bill. What passed there I am, of course, unable to say; but, considering that the Bill was passed unanimously by the House of Lords, and that there was no open discussion of the alterations proposed in the country, I do not know that I am taking an erroneous view when I attribute those alterations to one or other of the meetings which have been held in Pall Mall. But this is not the first time the course of the Government has been altered in reference to the measures which they have introduced. There is another Bill before Parliament, the principle of which has been affirmed not by the House of Lords only, but by both Houses of Parliament, and not only by one Parliament, but by two, and again in the present Session in the House of Lords. Somehow or other, nevertheless, that Bill was withdrawn after it passed a second reading—I am not sure that it had not passed through Committee—not in deference to anything which occurred in either House, but in deference to some opposition coming no one knows from where and no one knows from whom. Now, I think it is time that Parliament made a protest against such meetings as those to which I am alluding. The precedent immediately under our notice, though objectionable, is not so much so as that to which I have just referred; for that was a precedent virtually repealing a statute passed by Parliament without affording Parliament an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the subject. The alterations now proposed by the Government in this measure will, no doubt, come before Parliament for discussion; but I cannot help thinking it is a course extremely inconsistent and altogether unprecedented that Bills should be altered between leaving one House and appearing in the other, not in deference to any public discussion or any public expression of feeling, but in obedience to wishes emanating from some secret convention. I feel inclined to ask in whom the legislative power of the country is vested at the present moment? It is not vested in either House of Parliament, it is not vested in the Cabinet; but rather, it would appear, in some body which has more confidence in its secret influence in the Cabinet than that which it possesses in Parliament after free and open debate. I wish now to make one or two observations on the Bill as it came down from the House of Lords, especially as I do not concur in some of the opinions which have been expressed with regard to it on either side of the House. In my opinion, the thanks of Parliament and the country are due to the Government for having undertaken to deal with this subject. I feel, however, by no means certain that the thanks of the tenant farmers are particularly due to them. It has been pointed out that the Bill must have the effect of leading to a revision of valuation and to an increase of rent. Indeed, I believe that must be the tendency of any Bill, on whatever principle it may be founded, which professes to re-adjust the relations between landlord and tenant. I am of opinion that under the present system there are not many cases of actual hardship. I do not think there are many cases in which the tenant loses the capital he may have invested in improvements or in which he is debarred from investing his capital in the land. I do, however, believe that there is a vast number of cases where tenants who are not possessed of great energy or much capital to lay out on the soil are for a great number of years in the occupation of their farms at a rent very much below their value. The natural tendency then of any measure, good or otherwise, will be that the landlord in each case will say—"It may be perfectly true that you have obtained full security for the capital you have invested in improvements; but if we are to start on a new basis it is also perfectly fair that I should inquire whether my land is let at its full, or nearly full, value, and we must therefore begin with a re-valuation." Then tenant farmers then, in my opinion, will have received a boon, if this Bill passes, which they very little expected when they returned their friends to Parliament. But I am, on the whole, perfectly willing to admit that although the measure may not be beneficial to the great majority of the tenant farmers, it ought to be beneficial to the public at large, who are not interested so much in having the land let at the lowest price as that it should produce all the food for the support of the people which it is capable of producing, which is to be effected by the exertion of greater energy, and by the application of more capital to the cultivation of the soil. But while I admit that the object of the Government is a beneficial one, and that they deserve thanks for dealing with the subject, I think there is something wrong in their mode of proceeding. It appears to me that almost every landlord who has indicated any opinion on the point has shown it to be his intention not to avail himself of the provisions of this Bill, but rather of those which will enable him to contract himself out of it. That fact was apparent through the whole debate on this Bill in the House of Lords. I trust, in saying this, that I shall not infringe the rules of debate;

but from the very moment the announcement was made that freedom of contract was not to be interfered with, a sigh of relief escaped from certain persons sitting in "another place." Until the very last moment of the discussion in Committee that feeling on the part of landlords was perfectly apparent in the discussions of the other House. And, Sir, to avoid that dangerous ground, I may say that I have not seen a landlord who has informed me that it is his intention to abide by the provisions of this Bill. I may state from my own personal knowledge that many landlords think, and many land agents have advised their employers, that it would not be safe and expedient for them to remain under the provisions of this measure. And what makes me believe that there must be something wrong in the manner in which the Government undertook to execute their purpose is that it is not bad landlords who have expressed this intention of contracting themselves out of the Bill, but some of the very best landlords in England have done so. I do not know that it has been referred to to-night; but I should like to read a very short passage from a speech, not made in the House of Lords, by a noble Lord who is, perhaps, an authority inferior to none on this question. Lord Leicester, speaking at the dinner of a Norfolk agricultural society, said—

"We are indebted to Her Majesty's Government for the principles contained in this Bill." (So I say.) "And I trust that the majority of landlords will adopt those principles. But if they are wise, as soon as the Bill is passed they will contract themselves out of it, selecting those clauses and making those arrangements which are best adapted to meet their wants."

Well, I do not in the least wish to infer that Lord Leicester or any other landlords who have expressed the intention of contracting themselves out of this Bill have any intention whatever of withholding from their tenants anything which this Bill proposes to give them. The reason why they intend to contract themselves out of it is that they think the particular arrangements prescribed by the Bill are not the arrangements—perhaps they are much less liberal than the arrangements—which they deem best adapted to the management of their estates, and they very much prefer the agreements or leases by which they have hitherto conducted the relations between themselves and their tenants to the provisions of this measure. But it seems to me all the same that it cannot be a well-constructed Bill out of which the best landlords express at the outset their intention to contract themselves. A Bill, if it is to be a good one, ought to be a Bill to which every landlord will be able to consent; to which he might be able, indeed, to make alterations and additions, but out of which he ought not to be under the painful necessity of contracting himself before making arrangements he thinks best in dealing with his tenants. Look at what the effect of such an example will be upon landlords not so liberal as Lord Leicester. If Lord Leicester and other landlords as good as he deem it necessary to contract themselves out of the operation of the Bill for the purpose, perhaps, of dealing far more liberally with their tenants, does not the House see that that example will be taken advantage of by landlords for contracting themselves out of the Bill probably with totally different intentions? Well, what are the reasons which can induce landlords almost with one consent to express the intention of contracting themselves out of the Bill? They appear to me to be these:—The Bill defines a great deal too much; it goes into far too much detail, and attempts to lay down by far too hard-and-fast a line the mode of dealing in cases the circumstances of which differ in almost every conceivable respect. At the same time that it does that, the Bill seems to me to commit a very great error and leads to a great amount of confusion by confounding together under the one expression of improvements two things which in their nature are essentially different. Improvements, as defined by the Bill, include both those of permanent character, which are generally known in this country as landlord's improvements, and also those of a purely temporary character which are usually and, indeed, must be made by the tenant, and which really cannot be described as improvements at all. They may rather be described as expenditure incurred, or as ordinary acts of husbandry which are essential to the proper cultivation of the land. Although the Bill thus divides and classifies improvements, and lays down the compensation

has been affirmed not by the House of Lords only, but by both Houses of Parliament, and not only by one Parliament, but by two, and again in the present Session in the House of Lords. Somehow or other, nevertheless, that Bill was withdrawn after it passed a second reading—I am not sure that it had not passed through Committee—not in deference to anything which occurred in either House, but in deference to some opposition coming no one knows from where and no one knows from whom. They may rather be described as expenditure incurred, or as ordinary acts of husbandry which are essential to the proper cultivation of the land. Although the Bill thus divides and classifies improvements, and lays down the compensation which is to be given for them, it contains no clause that I can find recognizing the distinction between landlords' improvements and tenants' improvements, which, in my opinion, is absolutely vital. I may be told that the precedent is borrowed from an Act to which I was a party—the Irish Land Act. Well, it is not necessary that I should maintain that the Irish Land Act was perfect in every respect. I should, however, like to remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Irish Land Act was passed for a totally different state of things to that which now exists in England. But what we were thinking of—what Parliament was thinking of—when it passed that Act was that class of improvements known as landlords' improvements, which in Ireland were to a very great extent executed by the tenant, although in England that was the exception. If I am not misinformed, some inconvenience and difficulty has arisen in the working of the Irish Land Act from the indefiniteness of the term "improvements" as used in it. I maintain that any well-considered measure on this subject ought to treat these two classes of improvements as entirely distinct. As to the first class—the class of landlords' improvements—I very much doubt whether, under any circumstances in this country, it is necessary that Parliament should, to any considerable extent, interfere. Those clauses of the Bill which enable limited owners to charge their estates with improvements of this nature I entirely and heartily approve; but where the landlord is the entire owner of the estate, I very much doubt whether it is necessary for Parliament to interfere. As I have said, these improvements are in England generally executed by the landlord; and if, under any peculiar circumstances, it should be expedient or desirable that they should be executed by the tenant, I do not think there would be any inconvenience in the tenant going to the landlord and making a special agreement with him on the subject. But this case is totally different from that of the other class of improvements which I have ventured to describe as necessary acts of husbandry. There it is practically impossible for the tenant to enter into a special agreement with his landlord. Although on the best estates agreements are entered into in the absence of a sufficient custom, yet on estates where the same practice does not prevail it would be a great deal too much to put the tenant in a position to force this particular agreement upon the landlord. Even if it were otherwise determined, it appears to me to be quite unnecessary to go into all the intricate and complicated details which are dealt with in the Bill, and that it would be quite sufficient to lay down a simple rule of law, which I believe would coincide substantially with the practice on the best-managed estates, and certainly with every principle of equity and justice, and that is, that money expended upon acts of husbandry, necessary for the good cultivation of the farm, should, so far as the tenant has not obtained the benefit of them himself, be his property, and not the property of the landlord. In fact, all that is necessary, in my opinion, is that the present presumption of the law should be altered, and that instead of everything in the soil belonging to the landlord, as now, the presumption should be that that which is put into the soil in the course of the ordinary operations of agriculture belongs to the tenant. I do not profess that I should be able to draw up a clause which would exactly carry out my meaning; but I do not believe it would be impossible to frame a simple clause which would so alter the presumption of law as to meet the whole case with which it is necessary for the Legislature to deal. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) spoke in somewhat contemptuous terms of the effect of merely altering the presumption of law. I do not agree with my right hon. Friend. I do not think the effect would be so small as he supposes. I believe that if the presumption of law were altered, even if it were in the power of the parties to contract themselves out of it, very soon such a practice would be entirely abandoned. It is in the power of the parties to contract themselves out of any right which the law confers upon them, but we find in practice that it is very seldom done. I would lay down, as I have said, a simple rule of law, and would leave it to the two parties to enter into such agreement as they might think expedient for the purpose of carrying into force that rule of law, and in the absence of any such agreement, I would simply leave it to the tenant to establish his claim against the landlord in the same way as he would maintain any other legal right. If a system of reference were introduced the referee ought not to be limited and restricted, as proposed by this Bill, but should be allowed to value the improvements which the tenant has left in the soil in the best way that a man of sense and experience can do it. After what I have said there is no need for me to detain the House long on the subject of freedom of contract. It is unnecessary to interfere in the arrangements between landlords and tenants. If this Bill should pass, I believe it would be the exception rather than the rule that any tenant would contract himself out of any right which the law gave him. But if that were not the case, and if in subsequent years it were found necessary to declare that any contract made in contravention of the rule of law should not be valid, I should have no objection to an enactment to that effect. I should have very great objection to see the provisions of this Bill made compulsory or the provisions of any other Bill on this subject made compulsory; because I believe this or any other Bill if made compulsory would limit in a most injurious manner the arrangements which ought to be made between landlord and tenant. I was very glad to hear a very enlightened sentiment from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) in answer to something said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich. He begged to assure the House that he was not to be deterred by the apprehension of what may happen in future from doing what he thinks right to-day. That was a most encouraging sentiment, to emanate from the other side where have been often uttered most alarming statements about the introduction of the thin end of the wedge, and about the dangerous consequences of doing something to which no great objection might be taken at present, but which might be unduly extended in the future. But I am not quite so liberally disposed as my hon. Friend. I think it very dangerous for Parliament to pass a measure containing a principle of which it would be afraid if it were made compulsory. I am glad my right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich did not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice. I trust the hon. Member who has moved an Amendment (Sir George Campbell), and who has had an opportunity of expressing his views upon the subject, will not think it necessary to put the House to the trouble of a division; because, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich has pointed out, this Bill contains a valuable principle—namely, that a tenant shall be entitled to compensation for unexhausted improvements; and I cannot help thinking that the opinion of the House is that no division should be taken on the second reading. At the same time, I do think it would be wise on the part of the Government—especially in the present state of the Session and the great amount of work which remains for them to do—not to press forward this Bill in the present Session. I have given credit to the Government for bringing forward this question and for the spirit in which they have done so; but I doubt whether the Government or any party really interested in this question in the country have even now thoroughly considered it in all its bearings. Sir, I think there can be no doubt that the Bill which we are asked to read a second time is different from the Bill which the other House has already passed. I very much doubt whether the discussions which have been held throughout the country do not show that there is a very great impression prevailing that the landlord and tenant would rather gain than lose by the postponement of the question; and I believe the Government will be able to introduce a far more satisfactory measure if they would allow this Bill to be withdrawn for the present Session, and allow it to receive the consideration of the country during the Recess. I have to thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to me, and I must express the hope that the hon. Gentleman will not press his Amendment to a division.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the noble Lord has laid down the constitutional principle to-night that if a Bill comes down to this House from the House of Lords it is not open to any party in this House, or to persons outside of it, to offer an opinion or to express their sentiments on the subject, and that it is not open to the Government of the day to receive the honest expression of opinion by those who may support them in this House, or those who may sympathize with them in the country. Now, I entirely protest against this principle of the noble Lord. The Bill before us has been in this House for some time. Hon. Gentlemen have had the opportunity of studying its provisions. An expression of opinion upon those provisions has been freely and fully given without the walls of this House. To say that Her Majesty's Government have not the privilege of availing themselves of that expression of sentiment and that result of reflection appears to me a monstrous proposition. I have known, I may say, innumerable cases in which, when the second reading of a Bill was proposed, the Minister who had proposed it has announced some change which appeared to be, in the opinion of the Government, advantageous, and at the request of the Minister the House has gone into Committee pro forma when the Bill would be reported in order that the opinion of the House might be taken on the Bill in that form. What is this monstrous claim upon which the noble Lord has dilated? He says that it is the principle of the Bill? [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: The keystone.] The noble Lord has, in an irregular manner, quoted some expression with which I was not acquainted. I hope both Houses of Parliament will make no reference to what is irregular; but this I will say—that I know that in “another place” the expression of letting value was proposed by a “Whig” Peer (Lord Penzance), and the proposition was inserted in the Bill. [“No, no!”] You may say “No, no,” but it is upon that definition that we are arguing. We know that the principle of the Bill is to secure compensation for unexhausted improvements. That is the principle of the Bill to which the noble Lord himself has appealed in the latter part of his speech, and upon which he says both sides of this House are agreed, and therefore he trusts that the second reading will be assented to. The noble Lord then goes into an argument which appears to me to be inconsistent with the very purpose of the Bill, and the complaint was that the improvements which ought to be executed by the landlord should have been so mentioned in this Bill. But this Bill does not in any way assume that there are improvements to be executed by the landlord. The landlord has power to execute such, and it is unnecessary to insert them. But there are improvements which, according to the argument, ought to be executed by the landlord, but which are executed by the tenant; and what we have done is to indicate the mode by which compensation should be given to the tenant for executing those improvements, provided he executes them with the consent of the landlord; and therefore nothing in my mind can be travelling further from the scope of the Bill than the proposition of the noble Lord that we should provide in this Bill for the fulfilment of these improvements by the landlord. The noble Lord says there is not the least doubt that every landlord will contract himself out of this Bill with the tenants. Well, the noble Lord must have an extensive acquaintance with landlords to authorize him in giving so general and sweeping an account to the House. My experience is of a contrary description; but if the noble Lord is correct in the latter part of his speech, that one of the great features of this Bill is that it changes the presumption of the law and changes it in favour of the tenant, it is not very probable that the landlords would find their tenants so ready to contract themselves out of the Bill when that great change in their tenancy has been effected. No doubt that provision is a beneficial one; but it was denied at the beginning of the evening by the right hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen). The Government have, indeed, no great cause to complain of the manner in which this Bill has been received by the House when we remember the thunder with which the Government were menaced and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, which he introduced in a style and tone that could not fail to act upon the nerves of all who were sitting on the Treasury Bench. We were promised debates upon the principle of agricultural compulsion which should not be unworthy of those scenes which many of us remember. It now appears that, after all, this was only a loud and bustling surrender. The right hon. Gentleman indulged in a series of objections which is certainly a safe manoeuvre of rhetoric. When the time arrives that these criticisms are falsified, some of us, perhaps, may not be here; but whatever changes may occur it will be found that the English people will be then, as they are now, hostile to compulsion in such legislation. It may be all very well for hon. and right hon. Gentlemen to treat with affected contempt the notion that our legislation should be founded on permission, but permissive legislation is the characteristic of a free people. It is easy to adopt compulsory legislation when you have to deal with those who only exist to obey; but in a free country, and especially in a country like England, you must trust to persuasion and example as the two great elements, if you wish to effect any considerable change in the manners and customs of the people. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite seem proud that on all occasions they are the advocates of compulsion in legislation. I do not envy them the lordly attributes they arrogate to themselves. I am not sorry if they pursue a policy founded upon the principle of compulsion, because I think that so long as they do there is less chance of their changing their position. I trust that those who are sitting on this side of the House will give no encouragement to a policy which I believe to be so pernicious—that they will advocate that course upon public measures which they believe to be beneficial to the country; and that they will trust to example and persuasion to induce a free and intelligent people to adopt their views and to follow their example. Well, Sir, after the speech of the right hon. Member for Sandwich, which covered the whole ground of compulsion, we listened to a most remarkable address from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe); and if I am unable to reply to that speech, it is really because—although it was confined to one point which was apparently argued with great logical acumen—I could not, under any circumstances, succeed in ascertaining what the right hon. Gentleman intended to impress upon the House. So far as I could understand, the right hon. Gentleman had formed an imaginary clause that was certainly not in the Bill, and upon that imaginary clause, which he connected with one in the Bill, he arrived at a conclusion of peculiar perplexity. Twice in the course of his argument he adverted to something which I had not noticed and which I had omitted to explain. No wonder that I had omitted to notice a clause that does not exist. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to show—if he showed anything—that the treatment of the tenants under this clause must be compulsory, and that it must be inevitably so to such a degree that they could not extricate themselves from it, although the right hon. Member for Sandwich had proved that compulsion did not exist, and was, indeed, shamefully wanting in the Bill. He was suspicious that he had involved himself in some logical eccentricities which the House had not understood. So the right hon. Gentleman said—"I will recapitulate my position." I watched the right hon. Gentleman, and listened with intense attention to him, and this I can say, that when he recapitulated his position he did not use a single word, expression, or argument which he had used in the former part of his speech. The right hon. Gentleman was followed by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Thomas Acland), who was rich to-night in the peculiarity of his rhetoric which so particularly distinguishes him. The moment he sets up a position he always qualifies it. If he makes an assertion it is, to use a common expression "watered down." For a considerable period of time the hon. Baronet went on making wild charges against this measure, treating it with the utmost contumely, sparing no expression of scorn, and then ending by saying that he was perfectly ready to give his best exertions to render it a measure which would be satisfactory and useful to the country. I trust the House will not hesitate as to the course it will take. We are no longer threatened with a division to-night, but we have had some counsels given to us which would, if followed, paralyze our future actions. I trust the House will not be influenced by them. Rest assured that we are embarking in this Bill in a business which is dear to a great portion of the people of this country, and which, if with skill and temper it is carried into effect, will, I believe, remove many causes of discontent and misunderstanding, and confirm and increase those relations of confidence and amity which have for so long a period, and so greatly for the advantage of the country, existed between the owners and occupiers of the soil.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that perhaps it would facilitate business if he withdrew his Amendment, which was not made in any spirit of hostility to the Bill, but merely, as he supposed, as an instruction to the Government.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. GOLDSMID remarked that this was a subject in regard to which the House ought to be particularly careful. If the discussion of the Estimates were left till a quarter to 1 o'clock in the morning late in the Session the House would be giving up its greatest constitutional privilege—namely, the control of the public expenditure of the country. It was great negligence on the part of the Government to postpone Supply until so late in the Session, and he strongly protested against the granting of any further Votes on Account. The present Government, when in Opposition, took the ground he was now taking; but the measures advocated by hon. Gentlemen in Opposition were forgotten now that they were on the Treasury Bench.

Mr. MELDON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Meldon.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the House would consent to go into Committee and take a Vote on Account, as there were several branches of the public service which must otherwise come to a speedy standstill. The Government were most anxious to go into Committee, and get the Supply completed. They hoped to get the Civil Service Votes at that evening's sitting, and they would endeavour to proceed with the Education Votes next Thursday evening.

Mr. DODSON complained that Supply was unprecedentedly late this Session, and that the Government had made but feeble attempts to get on with the business.

Mr. SANDFORD said, he thought the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not quite satisfactory. Why was not Supply taken at an earlier period of the evening? Unless the Government gave a distinct pledge to get on with the business of Supply at the earliest possible moment, he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon).

Sir George Campbell

Mr. FAWCETT said, he thought that no one had condemned the conduct of general business so much as the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. Supply was more important than the progress of a number of Bills which the country had not demanded.

Mr. DILLWYN said, that for a long time past it had been exceptional to take Supply on Friday. He protested against private Members being deprived of their privileges.

Mr. HUNT agreed that the practice of taking Votes on Account was more honoured in the breach than the observance; but the circumstances of the Session had been peculiar, in consequence of the persistent opposition offered to the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill—an opposition which had helped to prevent the Government taking Supply as often as they could have wished.

Mr. GOLDSMID maintained that the real reason why Supply was so backward was because the Government had overcrowded the Order Book with unnecessary Bills.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER held that the Government had brought this difficulty upon themselves. It was utterly impossible for the Government to expect to carry all the Bills which were before the House. He thought it was the duty of the Government to state frankly what Bills it intended to pass, and what Bills it was willing to abandon. He thought the Government might postpone these Votes on Account till next Thursday.

Mr. SOLATER-BOTH maintained that the Government had been partly brought into its present position with respect to Supply because it had not followed the example of the last Government in abrogating the rule which enabled private Members to move their Resolutions on Monday nights upon the Motion for going into Supply. The right hon. Gentleman must know that if the Education Vote was put down for Thursday next, no other Votes could be taken.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 118: Majority 60.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. MACGREGOR moved the Adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Macgregor.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was useless to resist Motions of this kind at so late an hour; but he pointed out that unless the Government obtained money before the 30th of June it would be placed in a position of embarrassment, and therefore he expressed a hope that the Motion for the Adjournment of the House would not be pressed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion withdrawn.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT (1873) AMENDMENT [SALARIES, &C.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund, of an increased Salary and Pension to the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and of Compensation to the Second Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench for loss of Fees; and of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the Salaries and Remuneration of the Officers of the Courts of Common Pleas at Lancaster and Durham, and the Expenses of the said Courts, and of Compensation to any persons for loss of Fees or abolition of Office, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session for amending "The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873."

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

SEA FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. COLLINS, Bill to make better provision for the encouragement and regulation of the Coast and Deep Sea Fisheries of Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COLLINS, Mr. BUTT, and Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA.

DEAKIN'S INDEMNITY.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to relieve James Henry Deakin, of Warrington Park, in the county of Cornwall, esquire, from any penal consequences, disability, or disqualification which he may have incurred under 'The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854.'—(Mr. Staveley Hill.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dodds.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at Two o'clock.

NAVAL CADETS—THE NEW NAVAL COLLEGE.—OBSERVATIONS.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN rose to call attention to the Report of the Committee appointed by the Admiralty to inquire into the system of training Naval Cadets on board H.M.S. Britannia: and to ask, Whether a site has been selected for the new College; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay on the Table the Report of the Medical Director thereon? It would be in their Lordships' recollection that last Session the subject of the training and studies on board the Britannia had been brought under their notice by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford)—who, he regretted, was prevented by indisposition from being in his place that evening—in a very interesting speech. Though he did not go to the full length of the noble and learned Lord's position on that occasion when he said that several of the papers were not only too difficult for boys of the age of those who were candidates for naval cadetships, but would be found too difficult for very many of their Lordships, himself included, he did concur with the noble and learned Lord in thinking that some of those questions were not of the sort which boys of that age should be expected to answer. On the occasion to which he was referring his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury), answering on behalf of the Government, announced that it was the intention of his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty to appoint a Committee to inquire into the effects of the system pursued on the mental and physical condition of the boys admitted as naval cadets. Since that time the Committee had been appointed, had taken evidence, and had made its Report. Most of their Lordships had, no doubt, read that Report, and they would have perceived that as regarded the physical appearance of the young cadets the evidence given to the Committee did not bear out the figures furnished to the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford), and quoted by him in their Lordships' House. They reported that the cadets on board the Britannia were quite up to the average height, and were over the average weight of lads of the same age in the Public Schools; that their rate of growth was, if anything, in excess of the normal standard; they admitted that some of the cadets had a jaded appearance; but in no way did the physical condition of the cadets seem so unsatisfactory as had been represented in the figures quoted by the noble and learned Lord. It further appeared from the Report that as regarded the examinations, from the method adopted in the training of the boys, and the close connection between the questions and the course of study in the previous term, they were less severe than might be supposed by those who did not know that the questions were on subjects which the cadets had been recently engaged in studying. The Committee further reported that failures in passing were exceedingly rare; that a fair proportion of the boys obtained first-class certificates, and that the hours of study were by no means excessive; but they were, at the same time, of opinion that the boys were overtaxed by the number of subjects in which they were required to prepare themselves, and recommended the omission of a certain number of those subjects from the course. He was afraid that in its selection of these subjects the Committee had not acted very judiciously. Physics was one of them, and he thought it would be unfortunate

if naval cadets did not receive instruction as to the steam-engine. It therefore appeared that, though the system of instruction pursued on board the Britannia required to be amended in some particulars, it had in operation been, on the whole, satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, in moving the Navy Estimates for the present year, had announced the intention of the Government to substitute for the Britannia training ship a college on shore; he wished to know from his noble Friend whether a site had been selected for the new College? It was stated that Dartmouth was the place selected. Now, the climate of the South of England was relaxing; and he thought such a climate was not well suited for growing boys. Would there be any objection to lay upon the Table the Report of the Medical Director General on the site? Three years ago Mr. Goschen had it in contemplation to establish a Naval College, and a site was offered, which he rejected on account of the humidity and dampness of the climate. Great attention should be paid to the question of climate in the selection of a site, and most naval officers insisted that it should be in the vicinity of a great harbour. As to the system of competition which had been established by Mr. Childers, and which was only a competition between two boys for each vacancy, much had been said in condemnation of that system; but he did not think that the evidence taken before the Committee bore out the conclusion arrived at by the Committee with respect to the system. Of what might be called the military branch of the Navy, two witnesses were in favour of it, two were strongly against it, one was completely neutral, and the remaining one might be described as neutral. Of the several civilians of importance who were examined only one was against it. Taking the Blue Book from beginning to end he could not find any evidence to justify the conclusion arrived at by the Committee. In consequence of that conclusion the Government were abolishing competition and resorting to a test examination. Strong evidence was adduced before the Committee to show that "cramming" had existed long before the adoption of the competitive system into the Navy, and that there was no reason to believe that the number of cramming schools had been increased by it. Was cramming a necessity of the competitive system? He did not believe it. Cramming arose from the fear of parents that their sons would not pass, and it would be resorted to, whether the examinations were competitive or test examinations. Some of the best examinations had been passed by boys who had come up to the examination straight from school. Cases had come within his own knowledge in which persons had hesitated to allow their boys to go up because they had not been crammed; but on his advice they had allowed them to go up, and the boys passed. He ventured to think that a test examination would encourage cramming more than did the limited competitive system which had hitherto been in operation. As long as there was competition, however limited, there was uncertainty as to the standard which the candidate must reach; but once have your test examination and the crammer knew the exact standard up to which he must cram his pupil. In this country we had only recently established a new system of education for the Navy; we had at the head of it a College which was universally admitted to be successful, and we had placed the entrance examination under the President of the College. He believed that, so far as the evidence taken by the Committee could be regarded as proof, the complaints urged against competition had broken down, and yet, on the occasion of the last examinations that had been held, that successful system was departed from and a test system set up in its stead. He was not in favour of competitive examination from any abstract feeling. He could not, however, but notice the tendency that was at present showing itself to abolish competitive examination in every Department of the public service. He could not avoid calling attention to this subject and protesting against the step taken by the Admiralty as a retrograde one which had been taken without sufficient reason, and which he held to be prejudicial to the best interests of the Naval Service.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that this was not a party subject, and he gave credit to the predecessors of the present Government for having done a great deal of good in reference to the training of cadets for the Naval Service.

With respect to the first Question of his noble Friend—whether the Government had chosen the site for the new College, and whether they were willing to lay on the Table the Report of the Medical Director in reference to such site—he had to say that the Report of the Medical Director was not ready for presentation to the House. With respect to the site of the proposed Naval College—the late Government, as he understood, had the idea of fixing upon a site at Poole or Branksea Island. Now, he (the Earl of Malmesbury) must express his opinion that there could scarcely be a worse position for the College than Branksea Island. It lay in the middle of a muddy harbour and was as much infested with mosquitoes as any place he ever heard of in his life; and, further, there was not enough water to bring to the island any training-ship that might be required for the use of the cadets, and there were other objections to it. Her Majesty's Government had taken great pains to investigate the matter; and, as a result of their inquiries and examinations, they felt obliged to come to the conclusion that Dartmouth was the best site that could be selected. No doubt there were objections of climate there. In summer the heat of Dartmouth harbour was intense; but the College would be built on the heights; and training-ships would lie in the harbour below. Taking all circumstances into consideration, Dartmouth appeared to be the most convenient spot. The best situation and the most convenient spot would be selected for the site of the College. [The Earl of CAMPERDOWN asked if the site had been absolutely fixed upon?] No; the site had not yet been purchased, but the Report of the Committee appointed by the Admiralty had been printed with all the evidence, and their Lordships would be able to go through it, and they would see that there was quite as much said in favour of the site now selected as there had been against it. His noble Friend had quoted a number of extracts from evidence given before the Committee of Inquiry into the system of training the cadets, his (the Earl of Camperdown's) object being to show that the Committee was wrong in the conclusions at which it had arrived, and that the Government were wrong in deciding to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee. His noble Friend's experience must have taught him that the evidence given before Committees and Commissions was very contradictory. It was easy to divide it into two parts, and to select from it statements to support the particular side which you wished to support. He would undertake to extract from the Blue Book to which his noble Friend had recourse quite as much evidence to support the Report as he had quoted against it. He would go further, and assert that the weight of evidence was against the position for which his noble Friend contended. As to the question of instruction and training of the cadets, a complete scheme of education had been laid down on the recommendations of the Committee which differed from the present system, but in the opinion of the Admiralty was superior. The Committee were of opinion that the boys were overworked, and they recommended that not more than eight papers should be set down for one examination, and that the examination should not last beyond four or five days. At the time the Committee were conducting their inquiry the number of papers was from 10 to 14, and sometimes the examination lasted as long as nine days. They proposed that there should be additional time for recreation after dinner, and that not more than two subjects should be given in the morning and two in the afternoon, and that there should be 10 minutes between each subject. Their Lordships would remember that the examinations were not for men, but for boys, some of whom were only 11½ years old—in fact, the great objection to the studies was that these little boys were required to do too much. Having referred to the number of hours during which the cadets were employed at their studies, the Committee went on to say that at the examinations the boys were overtaxed by the excessive number of subjects and by the system of cramming. His noble Friend had given no definition of what he understood by "cramming." No doubt all their Lordships had been crammed; but what the Committee meant when they spoke of "cramming" was that system by which the candidates for an examination were brought up to the post in the highest condition—crammed with knowledge which they forgot within two or three days after the examination. When the Committee spoke in condemnatory language of competition they did not condemn it as a system—they only condemned its adoption in examinations of boys of the age of those who presented themselves for admission to the Navy. His noble Friend need not apprehend that an elementary knowledge of the steam-engines would be cut out from the subjects. Among the subjects which the Committee recommended in substitution for some which they would have omitted was mythology. He thought this was desirable, seeing that more than one-half the ships in the Navy had mythological names. The Committee recommended that the cadets should remain in the College three years instead of two, and that they should not have to attend school when they went to sea. That was because it was thought that attendance at school lessened the feelings of responsibility which a midshipman ought to possess, and which it was necessary to encourage. During the time the lads were in College they would have the advantage of instruction on board training ships. The subject of competition was an awkward and a touchy one. He observed that if any person said a word against competition in examination he was answered by the remark—"Oh, you are for ignorance." Now, as he had already pointed out, the Committee justified themselves on this head by stating that they were condemning competitive examination only in the case of very young boys. The Committee was composed of members, including Admiral Rice and Captain Graham, who were entitled to their Lordships' confidence, and the evidence taken before it was printed and accessible to all. Those who studied that evidence would, he thought, admit that there could be no doubt on two points—that a College would be found very much superior to a ship, and that the substitution of three for two years was a great improvement. It would, under these circumstances, be acknowledged, he felt satisfied, that the Admiralty had adopted the right course.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he looked upon the subject as a very important one. It appeared that the Government had determined to give up the Britannia, and to have a College on shore; and it seemed they had selected a site at the top of a hill near Dartmouth. As to the substitution of a College for the Britannia, he felt very much disposed to concur in the view taken by the Government; for the fact was that, as matters stood, we should soon not have a ship by which the Britannia could be replaced; and it was desirable that our old ships should be kept for the purpose of store ships in various parts of the world. As to the objection of the new Naval College being situated in Devonshire, he might point out to his noble Friend that Devonshire had produced some of our most renowned seamen and navigators. His noble Friend below him (the Earl of Camperdown) seemed to think that the report of a medical man was required before the site of the proposed College was fixed upon; but he himself was quite satisfied to know that it would be on the top of a hill in Devonshire. He was, at all events, glad to find that the site was not to be at Plymouth or Portsmouth, or any great seaport, to which he thought it would be most objectionable that the boys should be sent. As to the examinations which these boys were required to undergo, he must confess he was of opinion that they were a little too severe, and he arrived at that conclusion, not from his own personal experience, but from the evidence of those by whom the examinations were conducted. The Government, therefore, had, he could not help thinking, done well in appointing a Committee to look into the question, and the Committee had come to a wise conclusion in recommending that the examinations and subjects of study should be reduced. Though he thought the boys had been overworked, still they must receive a good education, the Navy now being a scientific profession, and the officers would have to compete with those of other nations; but as to little boys entering the service by competitive examinations, he believed, as at present conducted, it was of very doubtful good to them or to the country. The examiners wished to bring out their own skill and learning, and what was now wanted was that the examiners themselves should be educated as to the best mode of examining young boys. There was, of course, the advantage in competition that it did away in a great measure with anything like favouritism, and he found it extremely agreeable when at the Admiralty to be saved from endless applications by sending up boys to try what they could do by submitting themselves to examination. A good system of examination ought, at the same time, to be established. He certainly was disposed to agree very much in the expediency of the course which the Government had adopted, both in regard to the site of the College and in respect of the education of the cadets.

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, that the evidence before the Committee showed that many of the witnesses were not in favour of competition. In his own opinion, competitive examination was not so much a test of the boy's ability as of the skill of his tutor or his powers of memory. He thought the Government had done wisely in determining to abolish a test that was utterly fallacious. The Admiralty did not intend to adopt the recommendation of the Committee that a Board should be instituted, consisting of executive and medical officers combined, by whom the fitness of boys to enter the service should be decided. If from any reason, physical, moral, or otherwise, a boy was found unfit to enter the service, he could be sent home to his parents. By that no injury would be done either to the boy or to his parents, because he would have learnt what was a valuable lesson—namely, that he was not fitted for the line of life which he had first struck out for himself, and he could, therefore, at his early age, easily turn his mind to some more suitable occupations for which the education he had previously received would prove of value. As to the site at Dartmouth, the Report showed that the boys there were, in respect to growth, height, and weight, rather in excess than otherwise of those of any public school in the country; and he therefore came to the conclusion that the selection was judicious.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE thought that naval men were obliged to the noble Earl who had brought that question forward, although they might not agree with him on all points. His own opinion always had been that the proper place in which to bring up boys for the sea was on board of a man-of-war, in a roomy ship, such as they now had at Dartmouth. They need not be kept on board the training ships—they might be allowed plenty of recreation on shore. As to putting them into a College, he differed from the noble Duke on that point. If there was to be a Naval College he thought it should be erected at one of the great naval forts or arsenals, where the boys would every day see something of what would be their future life. It should not be forgotten that Portsmouth was not now what it was 50 years ago—a bad place. There was no reason why boys placed there should learn what it was best not to know. If a College was wanted, why not send the boys to Greenwich, where there was a College already, and a building big enough to hold them and the officers also?

LORD HAMPTON said, he quite agreed in thinking that their Lordships were much indebted to the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) for bringing the subject under their notice; but he was not able to agree with his noble Friend in the views which he had expressed, as he felt great satisfaction at the course which the present Board of Admiralty had adopted in reference to the competitive examinations of these boys. There was a great difference of opinion in relation to this subject, and he was sincerely glad that the Government had decided that in regard to these boys such examinations should not take place at the early ages mentioned in the Report. When he was at the Admiralty that question of competitive examination was rising in importance and in interest, and it came a good deal under his consideration; and he must say that if there was one point on which he was more determined than another while he was at the Admiralty, it was that he would not favour the introduction of competitive examination for boys of that early age. On other points he was not able to agree so entirely with the present Board of Admiralty or with the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) who had spoken that evening. As to the question of a Naval College, he did not agree with the Government. He differed also from the views expressed by the noble Duke opposite as to the question of site; and from those of the noble Earl below him (the Earl of Lauderdale), who had given a preference for training ships. He had consulted a great number of distinguished naval officers, and the great majority of them differed in opinion from his noble Friend, and said that a College on shore was far preferable to a ship afloat. He was glad, therefore, that the Board of Admiralty had decided upon giving up training ships and returning to the system of a Naval College. But when he came to the question as to where the College should be, he could not help expressing regret at the decision which the Board of Admiralty had come to. Their Lordships must not be surprised that the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset) had advocated the county of Devon; but it did not rest with any Committee to say whether Devonshire was or was not the best climate for these boys, for it was notorious to everybody that knew that county that the air was very relaxing, and therefore he was sorry that a large body of boys, collected from all parts of the kingdom, should be sent to a College situate in the most relaxing county in it. He would remind their Lordships that the late Government decided not to build a College upon Branksea Island because the air was so relaxing to the constitution; and it would be very difficult to persuade him that the air of Dartmouth, or at any other place on the coast of Devon, was better. But he regretted that Dartmouth had been selected, for he thought the place chosen should have been one where the boys would have ready access to a naval arsenal. If Devonshire were decided upon he should prefer Plymouth, and he could not believe that a good site there could not be found for a Naval College.

LORD DUNSANY said, he did not attach much importance to the fact that the climate of Devon was somewhat relaxing. Supposing the South Coast of England would be prejudicial to the health of these boys, what state would they be in after they left the South Coast of England and went to the West Coast of Africa? He believed that Dartmouth would not be a bad place for these boys, as they would have sea breezes on one side and the air of Dartmoor on the other. Moreover, it was but a short time they would have to spend at the College. To his mind there was no serious objection to Dartmouth, and it ought to be remembered that, according to the plan of the Government, part of the boys' time would be passed in tenders, which would serve as training ships, and that they would thus be enabled to visit some of our arsenals. He did not agree with competitive examinations. They were not a good test of real ability nor of moral qualities, nor of fitness for the service as officers. The boys should learn more of the practical part of seamanship and less of the theoretical. There should be cruisers at Dartmouth for the purpose of exercising the boys in seamanship, and for ascertaining what boys possessed qualities which would make them good and efficient officers. But though competitive examinations should be dispensed with, the Admiralty should not set up a low standard of education, because the naval officers of this country would have to compete with those of other countries, whom they would find to be highly educated.

ECCLESIASTICAL FEES REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

(The Archbishop of Canterbury.)

(NO. 161.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that his object was to take another step in the direction that had already been sanctioned on two occasions by Parliament. So, as 40 years ago, the Legislature, acting on the recommendations of a Commission which had examined into the subject of the Ecclesiastical Courts, passed an Act—the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 68—which enacted that the registrar of every Court exercising an ecclesiastical jurisdiction should transmit to the Treasury an annual account of fees received in each year; and by a subsequent Act—the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 98—it was enacted that every person thereafter appointed to any office of any Ecclesiastical Court in England should hold the same subject to all regulations and alterations which might thereafter be made by the authority of Parliament. It was to carry further the principle of these Acts that the present measure was introduced. The Bill provided, in the first place, that all persons hereafter appointed to ecclesiastical offices should hold the same subject to such regulations or alterations affecting the same or affecting the fees receivable in respect thereof as might be hereafter made by Parliament, and that they should make annual returns to the Treasury of the fees received by them. It was true that by the Acts to which he had referred the same conditions were imposed; but as time had passed on the holders of those offices appeared to have forgotten the terms upon which they held their appointments, and it was therefore necessary to remind them of the conditions by a fresh enactment. It was, however, intended by this Bill to deal gently with the present holders of these offices, and merely to remind them that they held their appointments subject to any re-adjustment of fees that Parliament might hereafter choose to make. But the special purpose of the present Bill was to provide that no such person should hold himself entitled to retain to his use the whole of the fees so received; and it was therefore enacted that all persons who should hereafter be appointed to such offices should pay to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England such proportion of the fees received by them as they should be required and directed to pay by a body consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the two Archbishops, and the Lord Chief Justice of England; to be placed by the Commissioners to the credit of a fund to be called the Ecclesiastical Fees Fund. This would relate only to the fees or salaries of persons appointed after the present date. It was absolutely necessary that some practical step should be taken in a matter which had from time to time occupied the attention of Parliament for the last 40 years—which had been inquired into by two Select Committees of their Lordships' House, and had been sought to be dealt with by Bills, the first of which he had himself introduced as early as the year 1869. Returns on the subject of the fees proposed to be dealt with had been ordered by their Lordships, but very imperfect Returns had been furnished—the order of their Lordships' House and the distinct provisions of an Act of Parliament on the subject having been in some cases altogether ignored;—and this fact accounted for the late period at which the Bill was presented for their Lordships' consideration. The Bill had one other object, which he would briefly refer to. In the discussion last year on the Public Worship Regulation Bill a question was raised as to the source from which the Judge to be appointed was to be paid, and it was considered that the Judge and the ecclesiastical fees had some sort of connection. The proposal the Bill made was this—that having by the proceedings he had explained obtained a Fee Fund a moderate sum should be paid to the Judge out of that Fund until the matter could be properly adjusted. The two Archbishops had been fortunate enough to find a learned and eminent Judge (Lord Penzance) who had undertaken to discharge the duties of the office, and who was already in receipt of a retiring pension for his previous services to the country. There were, however, certain expenses likely to arise in the administration of justice in the new Court which it would certainly be extremely unfair to require a Judge to defray out of his own resources. The learned and eminent person who had been appointed Judge of the Archbishops' Court of Canterbury and York—Mr. Granville Harcourt Vernon—and who by the provisions of the Act would in process of time become the sole Judge of the Ecclesiastical Courts of Canterbury and York, was ready to undertake those duties, asking only that the moderate expenses to which he had alluded should be repaid to him, and it seemed only reasonable that the Fund in question, which was liable to the distribution of Parliament, should be made available for the purpose. There was one other provision in the Bill—namely, that, whereas in the Provincial Ecclesiastical Court of York the Judge of that Court held various offices under one patent, it was important that he should be able, if he so desired, and as the Bill would enable him to do, to resign the one office without necessarily resigning the other.

—(The Archbishop of Canterbury.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he did not very well see how they could redistribute fees of which, at present, they had little or no knowledge. The Returns to which the most rev. Prelate had referred had been ordered as long back as May, 1874; but up to the present time the results had been very imperfect. No fewer than 11 dioceses had not returned the amount of the fees, amounting, he believed, to an enormous sum, which had been received by the Surrogates, and 40 Archdeacons had made no Returns at all, in defiance not only of their Lordships' Order, but of an Act of Parliament which required those Returns to be made year by year. At that moment, therefore, they were totally in the dark as to the fees which were to be dealt with, and which, he believed, would be found to be able to bear a heavier burden than was proposed to be laid upon them. He believed they would amount to, at least, £70,000 if properly accounted for.

EARL NELSON expressed a hope that as the Bill had been in their Lordships' hands so short a time, and as its second clause affected, in a certain degree, the existing holders of offices which were widely scattered up and down the country, some little time would be allowed to elapse before the Committee stage was taken. These Returns were made compulsory upon many persons, some of them clergymen, who had not hitherto made them, and if they were not made within a certain date they were to be fined £20, which was to be recovered before two justices of the peace at petty sessions. Ample notice ought to be given of this change of the law, so that a mine might not be sprung upon these people without notice. The 6th clause really referred to the salary of the new Judge. As Lord Penzance was to be the new Judge, he had no objection to the salary of the Judge being under this Bill £1,000 as long as he held the office. It was necessary, however, that this office should be held by a person of great weight and authority, and he trusted that a larger salary would be set apart, if necessary, for those who might succeed that noble and learned Judge. He could not understand how the funds for the salary of the new Judge were to be at present obtained. There could be no funds until some of the present holders died or vacated their offices; but the Act made it compulsory to pay the Judge, and he hoped that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would not have to pay the money out of their own pockets. The Act further stated that these funds were to be returned by January 1, but their Lordships were not told how much they amounted to.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, there was not the least intention to draw upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, as there would be no payment until there were funds in hand. The sum to be paid out of the Ecclesiastical Fees Fund to the Judge appointed under the Public Worship Regulation Act was to be £1,000, which would include £200, the salary of the Judge's clerk. At present, however, all that the Judge would receive would be £700 a-year from the office of Master of the Faculties, which would pass into his hands. It was only right to state that great pains had been bestowed upon this subject, and that there was a scheme in preparation which would be brought before Parliament next Session by which from 30 to 40 per cent of the whole of the fees would be saved to the clergy. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had stated the total amount of the fees to be £70,000; but it would, he believed, be found not to exceed £50,000. The only burden cast upon the Ecclesiastical Fees Fund by the Bill would be £1,000 per annum. The Judge would receive £800, which added to the £700, the salary of Master of the Faculties, would make his total salary £1,500 a-year, and there would be £200 for his clerk. This scheme was acceptable to the Judge, and would, he hoped, receive the assent of Parliament.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, he thought some change would have to be made in some of the clauses. He strongly objected to the 4th clause, under which anyone who failed to transmit an account of fees received by him within the time appointed might be taken up like a poacher, or other like offender, before two justices and fined £20. There was, moreover, a strong feeling with regard to several of these fees, especially as to churchwardens' fees, the Returns of which were included in the Bill. The reason was that, some time ago, when the authorities who had the power revised these fees throughout the country, they found that they were high in some dioceses and low in others, and they struck an average, and by so doing raised up the latter to the level of the former. Thus the fee for the admission of churchwarden used to be 12s. 6d. in his diocese. It was now raised to 18s., and so much dissatisfaction was caused that it was sometimes difficult to obtain payment of the fees at all. He hoped before that Bill became law some alteration would be made in Clause 5, and that it would be made clear that there was an intention to reduce the fees. It was true the objections he took might be met by Amendments in Committee; but he mentioned the points now because he feared the Bill would cause some dissatisfaction, which might be allayed if assurance were given that its defects would be considered in Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the remarks of the right rev. Prelate had reference to matters of detail, which might be re-considered in Committee: for instance, he did not consider it right that the existing officers should be put under penalties to which they were not at present subject. The Bill was professedly a temporary measure, and he agreed with the right rev. Prelate in the hope that this Bill might be regarded as a solemn pledge that the whole question of fees would be dealt with without further delay.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, in reply, thanked his right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Carlisle) for his criticism, and promised that the points he had raised should be considered before the Bill went into Committee. He concurred with the noble and learned Lord in regarding the Bill as a pledge that the matter was to be dealt with seriously, and was to be no longer played with. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had complained that certain Returns had not been made through the surrogates; but as those officers were paid for duties of quite a different character they were not to blame, and he might also mention that the fees estimated by the noble Earl at £70,000 were really £50,000 a-year. It had been said that certain fees which for some years had been received from the proctors, amounting to £3,000, had fallen in, and ought to have been applied by himself and the Bishop of London to the payment of the Judge under the Public Worship Regulation Act. The answer to that was simply that they had no such power. The fees in question lapsed to the person by whose consent they had been diverted for a certain number of years. With regard to time for consideration, if the Bill went into Committee on Friday next, would that satisfy the noble Earl?

EARL NELSON assented.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON

BILL—(No. 158.)

THIRD READING.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, (in the absence of Lord Hampton), in moving that the Bill be now read the third time, said, that great disappointment had been felt at the striking out of Clause 4 of the Bill, extending protection to the age of 13, and at the inconsistency with which the Bill, as it now stood, treated children under 13 as adult women, able to take care of themselves, while the Education Act treated them as children to be kept at school.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a third time, and passed.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (FOUR TOWNS, &amp;C.) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to confirm two Provisional Orders under The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1863, and the Acts amending the same.—Was presented by The LORD PRESIDENT; read 1st; and referred to the Examiners. (No. 170.)

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

THE TICHBORNE TRIAL—THE WITNESS MRS. MINA JURY.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Mrs. Mina Jury, a witness for the prosecution in the case of the Queen

v. Castro, is the same person as Mercivena Caulfield, who was convicted in Dublin, at the Commission Court holden on Thursday June 24th 1847, before two of Her Majesty's judges, for stealing a large quantity of wearing apparel, and was then sentenced to seven years transportation; and, if so, whether the Treasury was aware of the fact when she was produced as a witness against the claimant; and, whether he will state the whole amount of money paid by the prosecution to the said Mina Jury?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had made inquiries at the Home Office and the Treasury with regard to the matter, and he found that neither the Department of the Secretary of State nor the Solicitor to the Treasury had any knowledge whatever whether Mrs. Mina Jury was or was not the same person as Mercivena Caulfield; and that the first and only intimation the Treasury had had of any allegation that she was the same person was contained in the Question of the hon. Member. He had directed further inquiries to be made. Whilst the Government had no desire to conceal anything that had been done with regard to the expenses of the prosecution, the House had already determined on a division not to order a Return of the amounts paid to the witnesses in the case.

DR. KENEALY gave Notice that on an early day he should call attention to the subject of his Question.

INLAND REVENUE—THE ASSESSED TAXES.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to authorize the adoption of a single form of licence for articles taxable under the assessed taxes in lieu of a separate licence for each article; and, whether he proposes to alter the present arrangement as to the payment of legacy duties through stamp distributors?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he understood that a single form of licence had long been in use for the purpose named in the Question; but for reason of checks and account the issue was confined to collectors of Inland Revenue, whose address was given on the back of the forms of declaration, and any person by writing to the collector, enclosing a Post Office order or cheque for the amount, could obtain a licence in the enclosed form. In May, 1874, a proposal was made to the Treasury that legacy and succession business with persons in the provinces should be conducted by direct correspondence with the head office instead of through the stamp distributors, by which it was expected that a not inconsiderable saving would be effected chiefly from the poundage of the collectors. The question was hung up because it was accompanied by a condition that the salaries of the officials in the Legacy Duty Department should be revised. This question formed part of an inquiry which was now proceeding.

DOVER PIER AND HARBOUR BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. FRESHFIELD asked the President of the Board of Trade, What course he intends to pursue with the Dover Pier and Harbour Bill?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the strong opinion expressed by the Committee in favour of an extension of the work proposed by this Bill renders it necessary that the Government should re-consider the whole plan, and at this period of the Session there is not time to do so. The subject will be carefully considered during the Recess, and the course decided on to be taken next year.

EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN BILL.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his proposal that the Act 5 and 6 Vic., c. 7 (which applies to apprentices who have paid no premium for binding, the following Acts suspended since 1867, viz. 20 Geo. 2, c. 19; 32 Geo. 3, c. 57; 33 Geo. 3, c. 55; 4 Geo. 4, c. 29) shall be continued, while three of the above Acts are repealed, will have the effect of limiting the aforesaid Acts to such apprentices, while abolishing all the other provisions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the 5th and 6th Vic. c. 7, recited the following Acts:—20 Geo. II., c. 19; 33 Geo. III. c. 55; 4 Geo. IV. c. 29; and 32 Geo. III. c. 57. It then enacted that all the powers and provisions of the said recited Acts should be taken to extend to apprentices when any sum or premium of apprenticeship had been or should be paid. The Bill now upon the Table of the House repealed the last three of the said Acts, and expressly saved from repeal the reciting Act, 5 and 6 Vic. c. 7. The effect of that would be not in any way to revive any of the three repealed Acts, which would be repealed for all purposes, but simply to keep in operation the 5th and 6th Vic. c. 7. The other Act, 32 Geo. III. c. 57, was not repealed, because it had nothing to do with the subject of the Bill.

MERCANTILE MARINE—CASE OF THE "DRUID"—THE WRECK REGISTER, 1874 AND 1875.—QUESTIONS.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, seeing that the department has now a solicitor of its own, he intends to act upon the recommendation of the Court of Inquiry which sat upon the loss of the "Druid" steamship, and prosecute the owners for knowingly sending her to sea in an unseaworthy condition; and, further, when he thinks the Wreck Register for the year ending June 1874 will be issued to Members?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, that in accordance with the recommendation of the Court of Inquiry into the case of the Druid, which was held in February, 1873, proceedings were commenced by the Home Office, but the case being referred to the Law Officers of the Crown they gave their opinion that such proceedings should be stopped, as it would be a very difficult case to prove, especially as the Coroner's Jury had acquitted the captain of the charge of manslaughter. The proceedings, therefore, were not continued. The fact of the Board of Trade having now a solicitor of their own, did not therefore afford a reason for taking up proceedings two years and a-half after the case. In answer to the second Question, the Wreck Register up to June, 1874, was in the printer's hands and would be out in a few days. The Wreck Register up to June, 1875, would be out within a fortnight of the termination of this month, owing to arrangements which he had himself made. The delay in issuing last year's Register was owing to exceptional circumstances.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can take the Merchant Shipping Bill as the first Order of the Day on Monday, seeing that in its present position two nights' debates would probably finish the measure?

MR. DISRAELI, in reply, said, it had already been arranged that the first Order of the Day for Monday next should be the Second Reading of the Bill relating to the Labour Laws. It would not be convenient to put down the Merchant Shipping Bill as the second Order, but he would bear the matter in mind, and at the proper time announce the date on which the consideration of the Bill would be resumed.

COUNTY SURVEYORS SUPERANNUATION (IRELAND) BILL.—DEPUTY SURVEYORS.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received from the deputy surveyors of Ireland a statement setting forth certain grievances under which they feel that they suffer; and, whether he has considered their cases; and, if so, whether it is his intention by legislation to improve their condition; and, if so, whether during the present Session?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he had received from the deputy surveyors of Ireland such a statement as the hon. Member had mentioned. Their principal grievance seemed to be that the maximum limit of their salaries fixed by law was too low. He did not think it would be advisable to deal with the case of the deputy surveyors in the Bill now before the House, which related only to county surveyors; but unquestionably their case was one that might be considered in any Bill dealing generally with the position of county officers in Ireland.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, some dissatisfaction was expressed last night in the House as to the state of Committee of Supply. I think it was a natural dissatisfaction, and I must say that the Government was as little satisfied with the matter as the House could be. We have, however, been controlled by circumstances which it is difficult to meet—and it has been the fate of Ministers generally at this time of the Session to find themselves in that position. I have, however, carefully considered the matter, and I will inform the House of the proposals I contemplate making in order to meet this evil and justify the expectations of the House. I propose that the next fortnight, with the exception of the two Mondays, shall be devoted to Supply. On Monday, the 28th, the second reading of the Employers and Workmen Bill will be taken; on Tuesday morning the Civil Service Estimates; on Thursday, July 1, the Education Vote; on Friday, July 2, the Civil Service Votes, and on the following Tuesday they will be continued. On Thursday, July 8, I propose to take the Navy Estimates. We shall thus be pretty well able to deal with the whole of these questions. I trust that the House will find these arrangements convenient, and I hope that they will therefore allow the Government to take the Votes on Account to-night which are absolutely necessary. I may not be in Order; but I will ask the permission of the House to make one other remark. There has been a complaint expressed on the part of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington) that the Government has not announced the Bills they have introduced which they do not propose to carry forward. I think that the expectation of the House in that matter is perfectly justifiable, if that expectation is expressed at the right time; but, so far as I am informed, there is no precedent whatever for a Government coming forward and announcing the Bills they intend to relinquish in the month of June. I have before me Returns as to the conduct of the late Government in this matter. I find that in 1870 the announcement was made on July 18; in 1871, on July 17; in 1872, on July 15; in 1873, on July 7. This is still the month of June, and if I have not made any announcement of that character I have only acted in a manner that precedents justify. I have only to add—without exposing myself to the imputation of arrogant assumption—that those who are interested in the conduct of the Bills may be trusted as the best judges of the time when, and the manner in which, any announcement should be made to the House with respect to them.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

IRELAND—A ROYAL RESIDENCE IN IRELAND.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. STACPOOLE: Mr. Speaker—In moving the Address of which I have given Notice with reference to the establishment of a permanent Royal residence in Ireland as a measure of sound policy conducing to the advantage of the Crown and tending to promote universal satisfaction among the Irish people, I desire to bespeak the indulgence of the House, for I feel that in the task I have undertaken I will stand much in need of all the consideration and encouragement which my own observation, extending over a period of 15 years, satisfies me are never withheld from the humblest and least gifted of our Members. No one feels more conscious than I do of my own incapacity to present this question to the British Parliament as it ought to be presented; but nevertheless I think I should not allow my own shortcomings to stand in the way of an humble but earnest endeavour to obtain for the country to which I am proud to belong even a small modicum of that justice and fair dealing which, in my judgment, has, in this particular instance, been denied her. This question has been frequently before Parliament and discussed in the public journals. It is admitted on all hands that just ground of complaint exists in Ireland, by reason of the fact that in that portion of Her Majesty's dominions the Sovereign has no home, and I submit, considering the warm welcome which has always been accorded to the Monarch herself and to every Member of the Royal Family who have paid flying visits to the sister kingdom, such an anomalous and unprecedented state of things ought not to be allowed one hour's additional continuance. During the last 120 years, Royalty, I believe it will be found, has only spent 15 days in Ireland. Now, I ask, is there any special reason why the Crown should be an absentee? The Irish are naturally a loyal people, but it is hard to entertain great affection for persons you never see.

They know that the Queen remains for months among the Scotch mountains, or in the softer scenery of the Isle of Wight. It cannot escape their attention there is an Earl of Dublin who visits France, Germany, Denmark, Scotland, America, even India—every place, in fact, except Ireland. There is a Duke of Connaught who, I believe, never visited Connaught, and is consequently unacquainted with even so much as the personal appearance of that generous-hearted and chivalrous population. From the Revolution, with the exception of William the Third who went over to conquer, the only English Monarch that visited Ireland was George the Fourth, in 1820-21, and then for a quarter of a century the people of Ireland never saw their Monarch on Irish soil. The Queen has visited Ireland about three times in 38 years; but every year she goes to Scotland, and if she had done the same and gone over to Ireland, or even if some Members of her Family had gone there, remaining three or four months at a time, the country would have been much the better for it. Unless there be a Royal residence the Crown will always be an absentee, and the example set by the Crown is contagious. Let there be a Royal residence in Ireland, and it will become fashionable to resort to Ireland and to stop there, and absenteeism, from which Ireland suffers so much, will receive a heavy blow and great discouragement. Is it creditable to the genius of statesmanship that up to the present period of their lives the two foremost men who have taken such an advanced part in the legislative movements of the United Kingdom for the last half-century have never set their eyes on Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown has never been in Ireland, nor has the late Leader of the Opposition. Would this be the case if there was a Royal residence in Ireland? I ask the sanction of the House to my Motion not merely as an act of grace and kindly feeling, but as a matter of justice and fair dealing, and moreover I will urge my Resolution to a division, relying on the sense of honour which I know actuates British feeling, for I will undertake to prove from their own lips that the Leaders of Parties in this House stand pledged as solemnly as men can be to carry out in its entirety that which I advocate. Enormous sums of money have been spent in providing Royal Palaces in England, but no such expenditure has been made in Ireland, notwithstanding the fact, as I maintain, that Ireland, in proportion to her means, contributes more to the National Exchequer. Having made these preliminary observations, I now, with the permission of the House, proceed to trace the history of the Royal residence question so far as the late and the present Parliaments are concerned, and having done so, I will ask this Legislative Assembly to declare whether I have not conclusively made out a case for this Royal Address, and whether, in their opinion, both the Chief Minister of the Crown and the late Prime Minister are not bound in honour, by reason of their past promises, to take the matter out of my hands and arrange the manner in which the permanent establishment of a Royal residence shall be forthwith a matter of fact. So long ago as the month of May, 1868, now more than seven years since, my right hon. and learned Friend the senior Member for Clare County (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), who has always manifested a patriotic interest in this great national question, brought forward a Motion similar in substance, though not identical in terms, to that which I now have the honour of asking the House to approve. At that time the present Prime Minister was at the head of the Government, with a following, however, by no means so numerous or so powerful as it may now be considered. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman, in his blindest tones, distinctly held out a hope that at no distant period the expediency of establishing a residence for Royalty in Ireland would be specially recognized. What said the right hon. Gentleman in asking my right hon. Friend not to press his Motion to a division?

"There are many reasons upon which it is now unnecessary to dwell which would make it inconvenient, and not at all advantageous for the end which the hon. Baronet himself has in view, to compel an immediate Vote of this House. What has been said in the House on the subject to-day will, I am sure, not be forgotten. It is an expression of the feeling which animates very generally society and the whole country; and I trust the time may come when every portion of Her Majesty's dominions"—

England and Scotland being already bountifully favoured in this respect—

"will have the advantage of the presence of Her Majesty or some Member of the Royal Family. But, when alluding to the fact that the visits of the Sovereign to Ireland have not been of very long duration, we must remember that of necessity they could not be lengthened visits. There was no Royal Residence, no Palace in which Royalty could take up anything like a permanent abode. I know"—continued the Premier, and to this admission I desire to direct the particular attention of the House—

"that this tells favourably for the view of the hon. Baronet; I am not using it as an argument against his views; but I think it right to refer to the point, inasmuch as the brevity of the Royal visits is sometimes mentioned as an indication of indifference and of want of sympathy with the country, whereas it has been the consequence of difficulties which could not be overcome. There are many circumstances to be considered in connection with this subject, but the wish expressed in the Motion of the hon. Baronet is founded on the best feelings of our nature. I am sure the desire it conveys is one in which the country sympathizes; and I hope the time will come when we shall see these views entirely fulfilled."

—[3 Hansard, cxcii. 360-61.]

Now, having regard to the position then as now occupied by the right hon. Gentleman, I ask, could there be a stronger admission that, in the matter of those Royal visits and the non-existence of a Royal residence, Ireland was treated with manifest injustice; and that, so far as the First Minister of the Crown could pledge his Government, there existed a determination to remove what was felt to be a long-existing and sorely-felt grievance? Both sides of the House were liberal in their approval of the Premier's words of hope and encouragement, and the satisfaction which his apparently frank and favourable promise afforded Members, without distinction of nationality, or political faith, or party loyalty was in no degree diminished when the right hon. Gentleman who then led the Opposition recommended the Motion to be withdrawn, expressing an opinion that the case had been fairly met by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. As I claim on this occasion, for reasons which he will not have forgotten—though they are neither recorded in print or in writing—the vote and the influence he still possesses with the Liberal Party, of the Chief who so often led his followers to brilliant victories, I may be permitted to reproduce the words he uttered on the occasion in question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in alluding to the Premier's recognition of that which the people of Ireland feel so acutely as an insult, said—

Mr. Stacpoole

"I do not think that more could have been expected from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) than the acknowledgments which he has made; and, therefore, I wish to express my concurrence in the tone of his observations. At the same time, I feel strongly with my hon. Friend the Member for Clare, and without indicating the precise manner in which it can be done. . . . sympathizing as I do in the views of my hon. Friend, I may express the hope that some appropriate means may be found by which the personal relations between the Crown and the people of Ireland may be strengthened. I regard this as an object of public policy of no mean importance; but I think, after what has been said this evening, my hon. Friend would do well to comply with the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government."—[Ibid. 361.]

Yet in the face of those declarations by two eminent statesmen, both Advisers of the Crown, and both, it is to be assumed, deserving the confidence of their Sovereign, nothing has been done to strengthen the personal relations between the Crown and the people of Ireland; but, on the contrary, Royalty continues, as it were, to shun the Irish soil, and the leading statesmen of the day embrace each other in united efforts for forging coercive fetters to repress the liberties of a gallant, sensitive, and loyally devoted people. Well, Sir, the Motion was withdrawn in deference to the wish of the Premier, and in complete confidence that the promise given by the Premier, and to all intents and purposes endorsed by the then Leader of the Opposition, would be carried into practical operation. A change of Government took place. Nothing was heard of the matter in Parliament until July, 1870, when I asked a Question on the subject and received an answer which was far from satisfactory. In February, 1871, I again reminded the Prime Minister of the importance of dealing with the question, and he then was good enough to say that—

"That is a question which has been for some time in the view of Her Majesty's Government; but I am not in a condition, at the present moment, to make a positive announcement respecting it to my hon. Friend."—[3 Hansard, civ. 491.]

In July of the same year I again pressed for some definite information, asking the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich whether, in accordance with his conditional promise given on the 19th of June, and in the state of Public Business, it was the intention of the Government to deal with the subject of establishing a Royal residence in Ireland, with regard to which I then had a Motion on the Notice Paper. If the House will permit me, I should like to read the right hon. Gentleman's reply. He said—

"The important question to which his hon. Friend had more than once called attention, was first raised in recent times by the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), in 1868, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), then in office, stated that it was a proper subject for consideration, and he looked forward to the time when some measure on the subject might be adopted, and when some means would be found by which the personal feelings of attachment between the people of Ireland and the Crown might be strengthened. He fully agreed with the right hon. Gentleman on the expediency of dealing with this matter in a substantive manner, and since the present Government came into office it had not escaped their attention; but they thought the time had not yet completely come for them to arrive at a practical conclusion. As recently as within the last few months they had had the matter before them, and had taken into view the various alternative methods by which it would be possible to proceed. They had also to consider the novelty of the question, and the duty of bringing it before Parliament, whenever it was brought forward under circumstances most likely to ensure a favourable and full consideration . . . but they did look at it with a practical view, and it was their intention to take the earliest future opportunity of bringing the subject under the notice of Parliament which the state of public business might permit. He expressed a hope that his hon. Friend, who had given Notice of a Motion relative to this question for to-morrow night, would not bring forward the Motion, for it was evident that, if this matter was to be satisfactorily dealt with, so that whatever step was adopted might have that gracious aspect which all would wish, it would be far better in the public interest that it should not be anticipated by a discussion in that House, raised at the instance of an independent Member."—[3 Hansard, ccvii. 1341.]

I need hardly inform the House after what fell from the right hon. Gentleman's lips when he was in the cold shade of Opposition, in May, 1868, I experienced considerable disappointment at the vacillating nature of this diplomatic bit of fencing; so as soon as the right hon. Gentleman resumed his seat, I gave Notice that if the Government did not bring forward the question early in the Session of 1872 I should myself take action in the matter. In that Session, on no less than four different occasions was the matter pressed on the attention of the Government. So early as the 15th of February the First Lord of the Treasury was asked by me, whether Her Majesty's Government had come to any determination in reference to the Royal residence establishment in Ireland, and, if so, when he would be prepared to state their views on the subject? The right hon. Gentleman's reply was remarkable. In answer to my Question he said—

"When my hon. Friend put this Question to me at a late period of last Session, I made a reply, with the full expectation that at the opening, or at the early part of the present Session, I should be able to announce to him definitely the intentions of the Government; but circumstances during the winter, with which he and the whole House, and the public are acquainted, which were entirely beyond our control, have made it impossible for us to achieve that progress which we hoped for in the consideration of this matter. The subject, however, still occupies our attention, and we look forward to a period when we may be able to make known our conclusions with reference to it."—[3 Hansard, cclix. 487.]

So far so good—at least, so far as Parliamentary utterances from Ministerial lips are concerned. The last week in April had arrived, and nothing was made known. Expectations were raised in the minds of the Irish people, but not a particle of proof came to the surface to justify belief in the bona fides of Ministerial promises. So, impelled by pressure from without, and acting on the suggestion of several English Representatives, I again pressed the Government for an immediate and definite declaration of their intentions. The right hon. Gentleman still remained at the helm of political affairs, and on him devolved the duty of replying to my Question. His answer was this—

"I readily acknowledge the zeal of my hon. Friend upon this question; and if there were any risk of the Government forgetting its duty, I am sensible, that by his agitation, we should be reminded of it. Notwithstanding, I have no decision to announce to my hon. Friend at the present time. I will repeat the assurance I gave him on a former day that, when the Government is prepared to announce its decision on this subject, I will not wait for the opportunity afforded by a Question for the purpose of making it known. I will venture to remind my hon. Friend that this is not like an administrative question lying within the province of a department, but is one that involves large considerations; and events of importance have happened within the last six or eight months which have thrown difficulties in the way of securing for it that consideration which it was otherwise our intention to have given it."—[3 Hansard, cex. 1678.]

So matters remained until the Session seemed about to come to a close; and, on the 1st of July, as well as on the 18th of July, Ministers were reminded of their apathy and shortcomings in regard to this Royal residence question; but the old stereotyped reply was all that could be extracted from the First Lord of the period. "He had no communication to make, and no explanation to offer." The Session of 1873 was allowed to pass over in the expectation that the Government, of its own action, and in the face of rapidly declining popularity everywhere—but more especially in Ireland—would announce that all arrangements had been made for providing a suitable residence in Ireland for whatever Members of the Royal Family might desire to visit the sister country annually. But it was a vain hope and delusive expectation—Parliament met, sat for six months, and was prorogued without the slightest reference being made to the solemn undertaking of the past. We all know what occurred in the early part of 1874. The right hon. Gentleman opposite availed himself of the opportunity afforded by his Predecessors in office to strengthen his forces, and he once more assumed the reins of power. When he had comfortably settled down on the Ministerial Bench, an English Representative (Sir Eardley Wilmot) asked him—

"Whether, having regard to the often-expressed wishes of the people of Ireland, Her Majesty's Government would consider the expediency of establishing a Royal Residence there, with suitable provision for its maintenance, for the purpose of encouraging occasional visits of Members of the Royal Family to that portion of the United Kingdom?"

All that the right hon. Gentleman, in strange contrast to his unaffected utterance of 1868, vouchsafed in reply, was—

"I am very much in favour of Royal residences, particularly when they are inhabited; and the great interest I take in Ireland would make me much rejoice if there were Royal residences in that country inhabited by members of the Royal Family."—[3 Hansard, cccxi. 625.]

I trust the Government will consider the question favourably, and will assent to the Motion which I have submitted to the House. I wish to see a Royal residence in Ireland for the Queen to go to, and that it should be occupied by Her Majesty, or some Member of the Royal Family. I am sure that that would lead to an increase of loyalty in that country. I thank the House for the attention which has been extended to me, and beg to move the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

MR. HANKEY, in seconding the Motion, said, he did so because English Members were as deeply interested as the Irish Representatives in proposals which would tend to make the interests of the two countries identical. As to the particular Motion now before the House, it afforded him pleasure to second it, because he believed it would be a stepping-stone to the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He was old enough to remember the time when this latter question was brought forward in the House of Commons by Lord John Russell, with whom he voted; and he might remark that the arguments then adduced might be urged with still greater effect at the present moment. Archbishop Whately said that if one thing tended more than another to diminish loyal feelings in Ireland, it was the existence of the Lord Lieutenancy, as the people could not possibly be so loyal to a mere political Representative of the Government as they would be to their own Sovereign. He (Mr. Hankey) thought that the people of Ireland had a right to be governed exactly on the same principles as the people of England. He hoped the Government would consider the Motion favourably. Visits of Royalty to Ireland had been few and far between, and any arrangement which would render them more frequent ought to have the hearty support of hon. Members on both sides of the House. In his opinion, if the Queen occasionally visited that portion of her dominions the effect would be to make the people more loyal, for there could be no doubt that the Irish as a nation were essentially loyal, and were only too happy to have an opportunity of testifying their regard for Royalty.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly representing to Her Majesty that it would conduce to the advantage of the Crown and tend to promote universal satisfaction in Ireland if Her Majesty had a permanent residence in that country, and that this House, feeling deeply its importance, will cordially co-operate with Her Majesty in any steps She may be graciously pleased to take to carry out so desirable an object,"—(Mr. Stacpoole,)

—instead thereof.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant was not a question to be debated on that occasion, neither was the loyalty of the Irish people in question. The Queen had been twice in Ireland, and her own description of the manner in which the people received her—and which he (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) had witnessed—was that it was most enthusiastic, and therefore he need not discuss that question. The people of Ireland were thoroughly loyal, and always glad to see any Member of the Royal Family. The Prince and Princess of Wales had experienced a very warm reception when they visited the country—upon that point there was no doubt; but what he rose to say was, that he regretted that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ennis had, without consulting the Irish Members, brought forward that Motion in such a shape as might appear to commit them to what might appear a solicitation to the Queen to come and establish a Royal residence in Ireland. He was not aware that the people of Scotland had ever interfered in such a matter, which was more a question of Her Majesty's pleasure than anything else. The Queen ought to have the same liberty as any of her subjects, and select a residence for herself. There was no Parliamentary interference; and, as an Irish Member, he strongly protested against any pressure whatever being put upon either the Queen or any Member of the Royal Family to come and fix their residence, for however brief a period, in Ireland. Whenever they did so they would be most gladly received, and he did not doubt that many benefits to Ireland would arise from such visits and such occasional residence. They would tend to keep in Ireland many absentees, and encourage expenditure, especially in the capital; but he did not approve of the mode in which these objects were proposed to be attained. Therefore, although it was rather a dangerous thing for an Irish Member to speak on behalf of his Colleagues, he would say that the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was one they could not support. If the Queen or any Member of the Royal Family chose to go to Ireland to visit the cottages of the peasantry, to distribute books and presents, as was done in Scotland, no doubt it would promote the spirit of union and a feeling of satisfaction; but do not let it be supposed that it would induce the people to give up their determination to obtain Home Rule. If there were a

if so, when he would be prepared to state their views on the subject? The right hon. Gentleman's reply was remarkable. In answer to my Question he said—

"When my hon. Friend put this Question to me at a late period of last Session, I made a reply, with the full expectation that at the opening, or at the early part of the present Session, I should be able to announce to him definitely the intentions of the Government; but circumstances during the winter, with which he and the whole House, and the public are acquainted, which were entirely beyond our control, have made it impossible for us to achieve that progress which we hoped for in the consideration of this matter. —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words need to be left out stand part of the motion."

M<sup>C</sup>CARTHY DOWNING said, the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant was not a question to be debated on that occasion, neither was the loyalty of the Irish people in question. The Queen had been twice in Ireland, and her own description of the manner in which the people received her—and which he (Mr. M<sup>C</sup>Carthy Downing) had witnessed—was that it was most enthusiastic, and therefore he need not discuss that question. The people of Ireland were thoroughly loyal, and always glad to see any Member of the Royal Family. The Prince and Princess of Wales had experienced a very warm reception when they visited the country—upon that point there was no doubt; but what he rose to say was, that he regretted that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ennis had, without consulting the Irish Members, brought forward that Motion in such a shape as might appear to commit them to what might appear a solicitation to the Queen to come and establish a Royal residence in Ireland. He was not aware that the people of Scotland had ever interfered in such a matter, which was more a question of Her Majesty's pleasure than anything else. The Queen ought to have the same liberty as any of her subjects, and select a residence for herself. There was no Parliamentary interference; and, as an Irish Member, he strongly protested against any pressure whatever being put upon either the Queen or any Member of the Royal Family to come and fix their residence, for however brief a period, in Ireland. Whenever they did so they would be most gladly received, and he did not doubt that many benefits to Ireland would arise from such visits and such occasional residence. They would tend to keep in Ireland many absentees, and encourage expenditure, especially in the capital; but he did not approve of the mode in which these objects were proposed to be attained. Therefore, although it was rather a dangerous thing for an Irish Member to speak on behalf of his Colleagues, he would say that the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was one they could not support. If the Queen or any Member of the Royal Family chose to go to Ireland to visit the cottages of the peasantry, to distribute books and presents, as was done in Scotland, no doubt it would promote the spirit of union and a feeling of satisfaction; but do not let it be supposed that it would induce the people to give up their determination to obtain Home Rule. If there were a Royal Prince there to guide the councils of Irishmen, that would be an additional reason why they should demand a Parliament to manage their own affairs. He merely rose to say that as Representative of the county of Cork, he had nothing whatever to do with the bringing forward of the Motion. A similar Motion had been brought forward by an hon. Baronet, who withdrew it; and he hoped the hon. and gallant Member would take a similar course, and not force Irish Members who held views like his own to vote against the Motion, which might lead to misconceptions on the subject.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to point out that the late Prime Minister, who for one or two Sessions kept up the delusion on this question, at length said, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member opposite, that he had nothing whatever to communicate to him on the subject. That was the last reply the hon. and gallant Member had received, but he had not read that statement to the House. No Member of the Government or ex officio Member had thought proper to introduce this subject, but the hon. and gallant Member rushed in where angels feared to tread. Neither was the Motion concurred in by many of the old Irish Members, who, like himself, had been in the House for 20 years. No doubt, the Irish people were very anxious, and would be very glad, to see the Queen and any Member of the Royal Family as often as possible in Ireland; but there was not the slightest desire to put any compulsion upon them. It was the duty of the Minister of the Crown to advise Her Majesty on the subject, if he thought proper; and he certainly deprecated any interference on the part of Parliament. He did not think it would tend to promote the object they all had in view if the Minister was placed in a minority on this question, which had been, he regretted to say, unnecessarily complicated by the statements of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey). He did not think anything would be more fatal to the interests of Ireland than the withdrawal of the Lord Lieutenant. They must have a central authority in Ireland; it was suggested they should have a Secretary of State, but he could not be in Ireland more than three months of the year, and he would necessarily be a Party man. The Lord Chancellor, again, was appointed by a Party, and was usually a strong partizan. On the other hand, the Lords Lieutenant, though appointed by the Party in power for the time being, had never during their tenure of office been Party men, and had dispensed a splendid hospitality without any distinction, which had done and was doing much to maintain the capital of Ireland in the position it now occupied. Reference had been made to Scotland, but Scotland and Ireland were differently situated. There was a raging sea between Ireland and England. Enormous injury had been done to the metropolis of Ireland by the Union; but still greater injuries would be done by the withdrawal of the Lord Lieutenancy. He trusted the hon. and gallant Member would withdraw his Motion, for if it was pressed, he (Mr. Vance) must oppose it.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he also hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Ennis would withdraw the Motion, seeing that to press it would hardly be consistent with the dignity of the Crown, or the dignity of the Irish nation. [Mr. STACPOOLE: Certainly not.] When the Sovereign of this country evidenced in even the slightest manner a desire to reside sometimes among her Irish subjects, he much mistook the temper of his countrymen if, burying in oblivion a great deal that might be unpleasant, they did not show it to be true that every Irishman was a born gentleman, and that on such an occasion they could demean themselves in a manner thoroughly respectful towards the Sovereign. There were three parties in Ireland on this question. There were men who made a great noise in one or two of the Irish daily newspapers about the necessity of a Royal residence in Ireland, and who urged his hon. and gallant Friend to press the Queen, and to give her a strong hint that she would be failing in her duty to Ireland if she did not come and reside among the Irish people whether she wished it or not. That was not the opinion of the Irish people. They would be glad to see the Queen, but they would not throw themselves prostrate in the dust at her feet. It was said in Dublin society that the fashionable mode for an Irish Nobleman to adopt who wished to sell his mansion was to get a paragraph inserted in the Irish newspapers to the effect that it was "rumoured" that such and such a property was "about to be purchased by the Prince of Wales."

Mr. M'Carthy Downing

These people represented to Englishmen that if the Queen were to come and reside in Ireland for a fortnight no more would be heard about Home Rule nor about any other question. Nonsense; let not that House be deluded by the cackling noise of a little clique. The coming of the Queen to Ireland would not have the slightest effect upon those subjects. There was another party in Ireland who would complain of any word being said here expressive of a desire to receive the Queen respectfully. Those were what he called the "victims of the politics of despair," and they would say—"Oh, no, we do not want the Queen. It is wrong of any Irish Member to tell the House of Commons that the Queen would be received with respect in Ireland." Between these two extremes lay the mass of the Irish nation, and that mass was loyal, being influenced not in the sense of what was sometimes called in Ireland "flunkeyism," but in the sense of what might be described as the loyalty of duty, if not by that sentimental loyalty which he himself was weak enough sometimes to admire. When a few years ago the Queen was absent for a year or two from ceremonies in London he blushed at reading some of the articles written in English newspapers upon the topic. Although he made no extravagant professions of loyalty, he felt if the Sovereign so retired, from feelings which might have commanded the sympathy of every family in the kingdom, it ill became the "shopocracy" of London to mutter discontent, and almost to show disloyalty to the Throne. That feeling never would be found to prevail in Ireland. There was in Ireland a sentiment of loyalty ready at any moment to be warmed up into feelings of a still stronger character. Unhappily, in times past the dynasty had been mixed up with the cause of faction in Ireland. The character of William III. was now being understood there. He was a brave soldier and a tolerant man, though his name had been long used in Ireland for party purposes. He was ashamed of his countrymen when George IV. went to Ireland, and when he was met, as Byron said, "by a legion of cooks and an army of slaves." The Queen had been two or three times in Ireland, and no attempt upon her life had been made there, although in England there had been several such attempts. He hoped when next the Queen visited Ireland it would be for the purpose of opening the Irish Parliament. Until then he deprecated Motions like the present one, for it was not seemly that Her Majesty should receive a hint from an Irish Member or from the House of Commons as to where she should reside. He would only say if she came among her Irish subjects at such a time, she would be received with a "Cead mille a faihle."

MR. BUTT said, if his hon. and gallant Friend persevered with the Motion he should certainly vote for the Speaker leaving the Chair, which he would consider simply as the Previous Question with reference to the Resolution. He (Mr. Butt) opposed it on the same grounds as had been pointed out by several of his hon. Friends. He wished to remark that the question of the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy had no connection with the Motion. As he read the Motion, it was for an Address to the Queen not to come to live in Ireland, but to have a residence there; and regarding that point, he shared a good deal in what had been said by the hon. Member for Louth. He did not think either as Members of that House or as Irishmen they ought to solicit Her Majesty to live in any particular place. Of course, he would have been very glad if the Queen had become familiar with the beautiful scenery of Ireland instead of with that of Scotland, and he was sure that had she done so, she would have acquired the same esteem and affection which she had acquired in Scotland. But the whole value of such a residence would be found in the spontaneous action of Royalty itself. If it was the result of urgent solicitation or Party pressure the whole of its virtue, grace, and value would disappear. Why he was unwilling to vote for the Motion was because he thought a great deal of nonsense had been talked on this subject of a Royal residence in Ireland. That any Royal residence could correct the evils of which Irishmen complained was a mere delusion. There was such a thing as "a craze," and he hoped he should not be considered offensive if he said that his hon. and gallant Friend had a craze on the subject. Irishmen would be happy to see any Member of the Royal Family. None of the Royal Family who had ever visited Ireland had had any reason to complain, and whenever they visited Ireland again they would be received with respect, and he hoped with a certain amount of enthusiasm. But he would be sorry to vote for the Motion, lest it should be taken to imply that what it proposed would be a cure for the evils of Ireland, or lest it might exercise any constraint on Her Majesty's feelings.

MR. DISRAELI: This question, Sir, has been dealt with in so admirable a manner by the Irish Members whom we have listened to, that I really thought it was unnecessary for me to trouble you, because I can only repeat the sentiments which I have before expressed on this subject. By the Motion Parliament is called upon to express an opinion that Her Majesty or some other Member of her Family should take up a residence in Ireland, thereby performing an act the whole grace of which would be lost if the act itself were not spontaneous. No doubt it would be a matter of congratulation if there were a spontaneous feeling of this kind on the part of Her Majesty, and I am sure this House would respond in a becoming manner to a sentiment so refined and exalted. The Government of the day, whether represented by myself or by those who preceded me, have not neglected this business as the hon. and gallant Gentleman has supposed. We have given a due consideration to it; it is a subject of a complicated nature, and is not to be precipitated by a vote in Parliament. I think the matter has been placed before the House, by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) especially, in its true colours, and all the circumstances connected with it have been laid before us with an accuracy, truth, and propriety to which I believe the House responded. I think, therefore, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who brought forward the Motion will feel, as was felt by those who have considered it their duty to submit such views to Parliament before, that it would be more becoming and discreet on his part not to force the opinion of the House on the matter. Indeed, I should be very sorry that there should be apparently a great majority voting as, it would be represented, against the residence of Her Majesty in Ireland. Such a vote might be entirely misunderstood. Instead of there being, as there is, universally in this House a proper feeling on the subject, a feeling that such a matter ought to be left to the spontaneous sentiment of the Royal Family, the vote would be misunderstood and misrepresented abroad, and it would appear as if there were dissensions on a matter upon which there is no difference of opinion. With respect to the remarks made by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey), that hon. Gentleman has called upon us to consider the whole question of the Lord Lieutenancy. I protest against the introduction of that subject, and I question its discretion. I think it was entirely unnecessary. It introduced an element which mars the otherwise simple proposition before us. If the hon. Member for Peterborough really thinks that the institution of Lord Lieutenant is so injurious, let him bring the question before the consideration of Parliament. I shall be prepared to express the opinion of the Government upon it, and the opinion of the House may be legitimately taken on the subject. But on a question of this description no division ought to be taken. The sentiment is universal. It reflects credit on the loyalty and delicacy of feeling of the House, and I must protest against the Motion being pressed to a division.

DR. KENEALY said, he sincerely hoped that the hon. and gallant Member for Ennis would persist in going to a division, because he (Dr. Kenealy) wanted the true friends of the Irish people to be known; and, if not, he should look forward to an almost universal sentiment existing amongst the Irish people, that there was a great deal of sham in that House, and of blarneying going on at their expense. He was astonished that any Irish Representatives should speak against Her Majesty's residing in Ireland, or that any of them should sneer at a question of that kind, which entered so deeply into the feelings of the Irish nation. He wanted to see Ireland treated as an integral part of the Empire, and for Her Majesty to reside amongst her Irish people as she did amongst her English and Scotch people. The Irish were essentially monarchical, and when Her Majesty visited Ireland she was received with enthusiasm and loyalty. He could understand traders in sedition, persons deriving a guilty livelihood from moving the people of Ireland to sedition and disloyalty because Her Majesty did not reside there, fomenters of discord and abettors of murder, who thrived on their guilty acts—he could understand these, when speaking and voting against the Motion, but he could not understand how any one who wished to cement harmony and union between the two countries could do so. Her Majesty did not live or govern in this country for her own pleasure and amusement alone. She was a great public officer, who ought to live for the universal benefit of the people, and not selfishly and simply to consult her own gratification and pleasure in life. Everyone wished to consult the convenience and pleasure of the Sovereign, and there was no disaffection or disloyalty in expressing a hope that she would reside a portion of the year amongst her Irish people. On former occasions both the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich promised to entertain similar proposals, but now the right hon. Gentleman who was called the head of the Government, simply, perhaps, because the other Members of the Government were nothing but tails, or something of that kind, did not give the slightest hope that the wishes of the people in this respect would be realized. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had said there was no Royal residences in Ireland; but if he had been in that country he would have known there was one in the Phoenix Park perfectly well fitted for the accommodation and the residence of Her Majesty. He ought to go to Ireland and learn something of it, but he (Dr. Kenealy) supposed he was afraid to cross that "melancholy ocean," of which he had so plaintively written.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think, Sir, the hon. Member who has just spoken has somewhat misrepresented the character of the speeches which have been delivered on the subject. I have not heard any hon. Member rise to object, as he seems to think, to the idea of a Royal residence in Ireland. The only question on which there has been any difference of opinion between my hon. and gallant Friend who made the Motion and the hon. Members who subsequently addressed the House has been as to the degree in which it is consistent either with the dignity of Her Majesty or this House to press the subject on Her Majesty's consideration. I believe my hon. and gallant Friend entertains very strong views on this subject, and I do not know that it would be of any use for me to add my opinion to that which he has already received not to press his Motion to a division. I think if he does so he will by no means advance the object—a very laudable one—which he has in view; while if he refrains from so pressing it, he will have done good service in calling the attention of the Government to the matter; for it must not be assumed, as I think it might be possibly assumed, from the speeches made, possibly even from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, that this is a matter which can be settled entirely and solely by Her Majesty and the Royal Family. It must not be assumed by hon. Members that there is any unwillingness on the part of Her Majesty and the Royal Family to visit Ireland more frequently than they do now; but, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated, the subject is rather a complicated one, and it is not so easy as it might appear at first sight to make all the arrangements which would be necessary for the provision of a suitable residence for Her Majesty in Ireland. My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) has been taken to task for introducing the question of the Lord Lieutenancy. Now, I quite concur that it would not be desirable that the debate should wander into a discussion of the arguments for retaining or abolishing the Lord Lieutenancy; but I may at the same time say that the two questions are to a certain extent connected, and that one of the difficulties in reference to the more frequent visits of the Royal Family to Ireland is undoubtedly associated with the permanent residence there of a Representative of Her Majesty. What has been said in this debate, especially by those representing Irish constituencies, will, I am sure, be highly satisfactory to Her Majesty and the Royal Family. There never could have been any doubt that Her Majesty or any of her Family would, whenever they might visit Ireland, receive a welcome as loyal and respectful as in any other part of Her Majesty's dominions. And I feel the assurance may also be given that presuming there would be no unwillingness on the part of Her Majesty, whenever the Government, to whatever side of the House they may belong, are in a position to make any proposition to Parliament, this House will not be unwilling to entertain it in the most liberal spirit. But what I would venture to urge my hon. and gallant Friend to consider is this—that all that can be done is to press the subject on the attention of the Government. It is a question which the House cannot settle itself. It must wait till a proposition is made to it by the Government. I can assure him that the subject was not lost sight of by the late Government. Difficulties were found in the way; and it would appear those difficulties have not been removed, as I find Her Majesty's present Advisers have not been able to make any recommendation to the House. I can only repeat the assurance I have already given, that whenever they are in a condition to make any proposition to the House it will be received with satisfaction on all sides.

Mr. STACPOOLE said, that after the expressions which had fallen from the head of the Government, and in the hope that the subject would be dealt with next Session, he would withdraw his Motion. He would say, however, that he was not to be pooh-poohed by any hon. Member in doing what he considered right. If the Government did not take the matter up early next Session, he would bring the question before the House again.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

INDIA AND CHINA—THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.—RESOLUTION.

Mr. MARK STEWART,* in rising to call attention to the evidence given before the East India Finance Committee, 1871, with reference to the Opium Traffic; and to move—

“That this House is of opinion that the Imperial policy regulating the Opium traffic between India and China should be carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government with a view to the gradual withdrawal of the Government of India from the cultivation and manufacture of Opium,” said, that the subject was so wide in its scope, so comprehensive in its grasp, and so important in its many bearings on our Eastern interests and possessions, that he wished the cause had got a better advocate than himself. He was well aware how comparatively uninteresting questions relating to foreign politics were to many hon. Members; but when a question of this magnitude came before the House, which affected the the misery or the happiness of millions, it not only deserved, but demanded the most serious attention. It should be borne in mind that in proportion to the greatness and glory reflected on Great Britain by her Eastern Empire, a corresponding amount of responsibility was incurred. Personally, he had nothing to gain by raising this discussion, nor, as far he knew, were any of his constituents interested in it beyond sharing the feeling that this Opium Traffic had been productive of great evil; that what was morally wrong could never be politically right; and that if it was possible in these later days for the Government to withdraw from a hateful monopoly, to revise our Treaty rights, or to regulate and restrict the trade, it was the duty of the Government to take a wise and statesmanlike course for the purpose of securing the end in view. Happily this was not a Party question, and he could therefore reasonably look for support to both sides of the House. He had to thank his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for India for having assisted him in his search for Papers, and for having laid on the Table of the House some arcana of the India Office. A long time had elapsed since there had been a discussion in this House on the opium question. Except the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) in 1870, which was preceded by the discussion on Lord Ashley's in 1843, the question had not been brought before the House for a long time. He should endeavour in the remarks he was about to make to draw the attention of the House to what he considered to be the blot in the present system—namely, the Government monopoly in India. In doing so, it would be necessary not only to draw attention to the present aspect of affairs, but to review briefly the history of the past, in order rightly to understand this particular question. Before the year 1773 the only opium imported into China came from the hands of the Portuguese. In that year the East India Company, possessing very little knowledge of China, entered slightly on this trade. Overtures to extend our general mercantile transactions were made by Lord Macartney in 1798, and by Lord Amherst, in 1816. They were, however, courteously received, and as discourteously dismissed. Our intercourse had not been of a beneficial, but of a very unpromising character in its moral and social consequences. The Celestial Empire was capable of producing everything in itself. It possessed great variety of climate, and a hardy, frugal, and industrious population, who were, for Orientals, in a high state of civilization. In 1833 the exclusive commercial privileges of the East India Company ceased, and the trade of Canton was thrown open. The provincial authorities declined to treat with Lord Napier, the political agent of the British Government, and would only carry on negotiations through the Hong merchants, a body of privileged traders. Accordingly all communication was suspended with the British envoy. Hostilities were forthwith commenced; Lord Napier ordered the Chinese ships to be fired upon, and was compelled to retire. Shortly afterwards, his death at Macao resulted in the appointment of Sir George Robinson, who took up his residence at Lintin Island, at the mouth of the Canton River. During his period of office a great smuggling trade was carried on, but his policy was very unacceptable to the British merchants. He would not (as ordered by the Home Government) insist that all trade transactions should come under the superintendence of the political agent, because, now that the trade was thrown open, such an agent would have so little control (as compared with the supercargo of the East India Company) over the ships employed. Consequently, in 1836, he was succeeded by Captain Elliott as Chief Superintendent of Trade. And now let the House observe the rapid increase of the opium trade. The quantity of opium smuggled into China in 1800 was 4,570 chests; in 1824, 12,023 chests; and in 1834, 23,902 chests, representing in value £1,111,038. Nine-tenths of this unlawful trade was carried on by foreign merchants. With regard to the statements that the Chinese Government connived at the trade, the edicts which had from time to time—1800 to 1870—been issued would prove that they tried, but in vain, to suppress it. In 1830 the Emperor issued an edict declaring that—

“The injury done by the influx of opium, and by the increase of those who inhale it, is nearly equal to that of a conflagration, and that the waste of property and the hurt done to human beings is every day greater than the preceding.”

In 1832, Le, Governor of Canton, issued a stringent “chop” proclamation, or order, against the importation of the “opium dirt,” declaring it “a spreading poison inexhaustible, and in its injurious effects extreme.” Councillor Choo-Tsun, in one of his communications, has said—

“The wide-spreading and baneful influence of opium when regarded simply as injurious to property is of inferior importance, but when regarded as hurtful to the people it demands most serious consideration, for on the people lies the only foundation of the Empire. A deficiency of property may be supplied, and an impoverished people improved, whereas it is beyond the power of any artificial means to save a people corrupted by luxury . . . . and if the camp be once contaminated, the baneful principle will work its way, and its habit will be contracted beyond the power of reform. When the periodical time for the desire comes round, how can the victims, their legs tottering, their hands trembling, their eyes flowing with childish tears, be able in any way to attend to their proper exercises? How can such men form strong and powerful legions?”

After unceasing protests, in 1839, Lin-the Chinese Commissioner from the Peking Court, arrived at Canton, and demanded from the foreign ships all the opium to be given up. A cordon of armed Chinese boats surrounded the receiving ships. No assaults were committed, but all ingress and egress prohibited except by coolies to procure provisions. The opium was given up under protest, and after being mixed with oil and lime in conjunction with sea-water it was destroyed. The quantity thus destroyed amounted to 20,283 chests, representing a value of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 sterling. This was

“A solitary instance in the history of the world of a pagan Monarch preferring to destroy what would injure his subjects rather than to fill his pockets with the proceeds of the sale.”

Hence arose the first war with China, known, whether wrongly or rightly, as the Opium War. In January, 1840, an Imperial edict appeared, directing that all trade with England should cease for ever. In 1842 the Treaty of Nankin was concluded. That treaty was most humiliating in the eyes of the Chinese, because not only had large sums for the smuggled opium to be paid, amounting to some 6,000,000 dollars, but large compensation had to be made to private merchants to pay their contracted debts, besides the expenses of the war, and the cession of the island of Hong Kong to the British. One would naturally have supposed that after what had occurred, some steps would have been taken to stop this opium smuggling. For 14 years, however, the quantity of opium went on increasing. The number of chests exported to China from India in 15 years, ending 1859, amounted on the average to 74,091 chests, valued at £4,484,147, all of which were smuggled. In 1856 the smuggling and piracy had become much worse, and Hong Kong, a barren rock, inhabited by a population of 200 to 300, was at that time the receptacle of 40,000 to 50,000, the scum of the heathen and civilized world. This was the place of which Sir Henry Pottinger said, in 1842—

"Its pure and noble institutions would stand one day as a model whereby to work the regeneration of the Chinese Empire."

Chinese vessels changed their registration for the purpose of carrying opium, and were registered under the British flag. On October 8th, 1856, the lorcha Arrow and her crew of 12 men were seized, although she had lost the right of carrying the English flag on the 27th September previous. Nine of the men were first given up by the Chinese, and the remaining three afterwards, but no apology was offered. Satisfaction was demanded for this outrage, as it was termed—although the crew were noted smugglers, if not pirates—and in 1858—in the second Chinese war, soon after—Canton was taken, and the forts of Pei-Ho captured. In 1860, Lord Elgin with Baron Gros carried the Takoo forts, burned the Summer Palace, and concluded the Treaty of Tien-tsin. That treaty was to the Chinese still more humiliating than the previous one, and he (Mr. Stewart) called the attention of the House to the fact that it was only by this Treaty in 1860, after the most vigorous protests from the Chinese, that the importation and sale of opium was legalized with a duty of 10 per cent. How true it is, as Mr. Mitchell puts it—

"We bring the Chinese nothing that is really popular amongst them except our opium. Opium is the 'open sesame' to their stony hearts; woe betide the trade the day we meddle with it to its injury."

Having given this brief history of the opening of the trade, without which, he maintained, no one could properly understand the subject, he would proceed to deal with the present Indian system. There were two great systems in existence—the Bengal, and the Bombay or Malwa. The latter referred to the opium grown in the free Native states of Holkar, Scindia, Rewah, and some of the petty Rajpoot states. The Malwa portion of the opium was weighed in the Government scales at Indore, and the Guzerat portion at Ahmedabad, and passes were issued which cleared the drug until placed on ship-board. Recently, scales had been established at two other stations—namely, at Oojein and Oodaypoor. The chests, which weighed 112 pounds, were sent down carefully guarded to Bombay, where a heavy pass export duty of 600 Rs. per chest was imposed. The duty was practically levied before it was sent down, and paid by bill, when the pass was given to cover it to Bombay. The Government had nothing to do with its manufacture, and in strength it excelled the opium of Bengal. With regard to the Bengal monopoly system, there were two Government agencies, Patna for the North Western Provinces, Behar district and Chota Nagpore, and Ghazee-pore or Benares for Bengal Proper—including the Benares division, Allahabad and Oude. Under the sub-agents native establishments were appointed to look after the cultivation of the poppies. A ryot desirous of entering into the cultivation had to wait on the sub-agent, get his land measured, a cultivation licence, and the usual advance before the sowing season. On the plant appearing above ground a second advance was made, if the usual conditions had been fulfilled. When the pod has arrived at maturity, it is cut vertically across with three lines, the juice collected in vessels, and the produce subsequently taken to the office of the sub-agent, who pays the full price for it, subject to a further adjustment. This takes place in the month of April. The opium is then forwarded to the factory—where the final payment is given—and exposed in large masonry tanks till reduced to an uniform consistency, when it is packed in chests of 140 pounds weight, for home and foreign consumption—chiefly the latter—as only some £300,000 worth is sold in India. The following year, these are sold by auction at periodical sales in Calcutta by the Government official. The House would observe that from first to last the matter was entirely in the hands of the Government, who fostered its cultivation, and, with that object in view, made advances to the ryots. In the Punjab a good deal of opium was consumed, and a tax of two rupees per acre imposed. It would appear from the Returns, however, the cultivation was diminishing in that district, as in 1870-71, 13,229 acres were cultivated, and in 1871-72, 6,225. Opium was not necessarily fatal in its operation, but the habit could not be left off, and was very degrading. In China no one confessed to its use, and those in the habit of taking it concealed from shame their finger and thumb, which became stained by the use of the pipe. It produced its worst effects among the lower classes. If left off suddenly, dysentery followed, which the upper classes could take remedies for. In Assam the cultivation was prohibited, because it was found that the people were gradually dying out from opium consumption. In the debate in 1870, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) said—"An inquiry hardly touched upon"—by Sir Wilfrid Lawson—"was the nature of opium and its use, and whether the use of opium is necessarily connected with its abuse." Mr. T. T. Cooper, in his evidence, stated that his bearer-coolies could go a long way on opium, but that the effects were terrible, if, for a single day, the pipe was discontinued. He further stated, he had often seen naked dead bodies of the opium-smokers—unable to procure the drug—lying on the streets in the morning. It had been calculated that the proportion of opium-smokers at Canton was, in the case of the mercantile classes, 30 per cent; in the case of the Yamun officials, 90 per cent; and in the case of the soldiers 40 to 50 per cent. It was almost impossible to restrain the taste for it, and it was found necessary to increase the quantity to be smoked, in order to gain the same amount of satisfaction. So the House will see that the abuse is mixed up with the use. Mr. D. P. Broadway, Missionary, Patna, stated that—

"Its demoralizing influence on those who use it is certain, and so keen is the appetite when they become addicted to taking opium, that, unless the craving is satisfied, it results in the prostration of the whole bodily system, and even dissolution; . . . nearly all those who indulge in the drug are prevented from attending to their proper sphere of work, and are ultimately reduced to poverty."

The Rev. Mr. Shackell, Church Missionary Society, North India, declared that—

"Physically, the habit weakens the man, and renders him unfit to labour; morally, it seems to put him into a kind of lethargy, so that he apparently almost loses the sense of right or wrong."

Dr. Kerr was of opinion that 10,000 deaths occurred annually from the use of opium. He had many other quotations from gentlemen of great experience, but he refrained from quoting more. He now came to the question of the Bengal monopoly. All persons must admit that a monopoly was not in any sense a useful or sound policy, and it would be found that the Bengal monopoly was exceptionally bad. It was bad considered on the grounds of political economy, for the following reasons:—The Government carried on the manufacture itself, and substituted paid officials who might lack knowledge and—what was perhaps the greatest stimulant to success—self-interest. In the case of indigo cultivation, which was freed from Government control, success was obtained. Again, traders' profits were more than counterbalanced by traders' risks. There must also be taken into account the question of establishment, expenses, and plant. Then there was an immense sum of capital, calculated at £2,750,000 sterling, locked up for the best part of two years by reason of the advances, and nothing was deducted for interest. A private firm would only push increased cultivation when a demand rose for it. The monopoly also encouraged smuggling; and official pressure was also assuredly used. Mr. Hollings informed the Indigo Commission on this point, that—

"All the members of the Department are constantly engaged in using their best endeavours to extend the cultivation (of opium) with the consent of the parties engaging, and everything in the way of fair inducement and persuasion is not only permitted but encouraged."

There was no principle or standard to guide the fixing of the pass duty at Bombay. In 1864, on account of the oscillation of trade caused by arbitrarily glutting the market, the house of Sassoon and Co. petitioned Government to lower the duty from 600 to 400 rupees. They stated that opium which cost from 1,500 to 1,600 rupees in Bombay, one year had not exceeded 1,575 in the China market, involving heavy losses on firms in Malwa and Bombay. That was another proof that the monopoly was bad. Sir William Muir, a great authority on Indian finance, in his Minute of 1860, recognized this, and went on to say—

"The uncertainty it produced has gone a long way towards stimulating the spirit of unsound speculation and gambling which characterizes the trade, and has ruined many a firm in Western India."

The monopoly was also bad from a moral point of view. It was said that the Government controlled the trade and restricted it; but they found that, although Sir Cecil Beadon, in 1865, forcibly urged that 45,000 chests should be the limit for the Bengal monopoly, in 1867 it amounted to 48,000 chests. Then take the case of British Burmah, where every effort was made to push the traffic, as we read in the evidence of the Select Committee—

"In the Indo-Chinese districts of British Burmah, the action of the Departments in promoting the sale of opium has long been a public scandal. . . . Prior to the introduction of British rule into Aracan, the punishment for using opium was death. The people were hard-working, sober, and simple-minded. Unfortunately, one of the earliest measures of our administration was the introduction of the akbari rules by the Bengal Board of Revenue. Mr. Hind, who had passed the greater part of his long life amongst the people of Aracan, described the progress of demoralization. Organized efforts were made by Bengal agents to introduce the use of the drug, and to create a taste for it amongst the rising generation. The general plan was to open a shop with a few cakes of opium, and to invite the young men and distribute it gratuitously. Then, when the taste was established, the opium was sold at a low rate. Finally, as it spread throughout the neighbourhood, the price was raised, and large profits ensued. Sir Arthur Phayre's account of the demoralization of Aracan by the Bengal akbari rules is very graphic; but Mr. Hind's statements were more striking, as he entered more into detail. He saw a fine healthy generation of strong men succeeded by a rising generation of haggard opium-smokers and eaters, who indulged to such an extent that their mental and physical powers were alike wasted. Then followed a fearful increase in gambling and dacoity."

He asked the House—Can any worse description be found of a system under Government control? In fact, the trade was found invaluable on financial grounds, apart from all considerations of morality, to replenish an exhausted exchequer when any possible deficit might be apprehended: so cannot be given up. Again, the monopoly was bad on international grounds, because the Chinese hated us for it. They did not like parting with so large a revenue as £9,000,000 to get in return nothing but smoke. It had been enforced at the point of the sword, and was degrading to the Government. Hon. Members might ask what was the opinion in China about opium? It was this, and he gave it on the authority of gentlemen who had spent more than half their life there. No one would take a servant who was an opium-smoker. The people were so addicted to the habit, so powerful were its enticing influences, that it was impossible, they said, they could resist it; and if it had not been introduced at the point of the sword, and afterwards under a treaty forced upon China, the Chinese Government would long ago have banished it from their shores. He should be met at once with the argument that the Chinese Government were not sincere; but a good deal could be done now on their part which never could have been done before. The House must recollect that there has been a great advance of civilization in China. They were building on the different stations gunboats equipped with some of the best rifled guns in the world; before this they were comparatively powerless. This force could greatly prevent smuggling; besides this, they had large forces in training now under European officers. They were bringing hardy men down from the north who could fight, and whose frames had not been enervated by opium-smoking. Well, they had civilization in this respect, although his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle would hardly agree that that was real civilization. Now, to say that the Chinese Government were not sincere was surely not correct. There was a very important conversation related in the form of a Minute by Sir Rutherford Alcock, in 1869, to the Indian Government. So important did he think this that it was especially laid before the Council in Calcutta by himself. That Minister was no mean authority, for the House would remember he was our Ambassador at Peking. Sir Rutherford Alcock based his belief on reports of merchants in China, delegates of the Chamber of Commerce, such as Sassoon and Co.; and the Consul's reports—quite disinterested evidence; and he came to the conclusion that there was a great deal of sincerity on the part of the Government. He pointed out that if we were determined to bring opium into the country, the Chinese were determined to grow it themselves, and so outbid us, by withdrawing the prohibition on its growth, which by the present law is death. The official Note further urged that some joint action should be taken by both Governments to prohibit the growth of the poppy. It was found between 500 and 600 miles south from the capital no opium was grown, but it was grown on the western side, where the Government have less authority. He held in his hand many extracts as regards its effect on the population, but he intended to trouble the House with only one. Evidence of the most conclusive character—evidence which he believed could not be contradicted—had been supplied on this question by persons who had lived 20, 30, and 40 years in China; and although he knew it was sometimes a matter of reproach to quote a missionary, still he would say that those gentlemen had greater opportunities of knowing what was going on in the country by their familiar intercourse with the people, who naturally pour out their complaints to them, than persons merely engaged in trade. Rev. R. H. Graves, M.D., 13 years Medical Missionary at Canton, says—

“The effects of opium-smoking are:—1st. Physiologically; excitement, evinced by nervous restlessness and talkativeness; and as one becomes more and more addicted to the habit, loss of appetite, emaciation, a dull leaden hue, stiff movements and gait, obstinate constipation, and occasionally skin diseases. 2nd. Socially; loss of time, resulting from the time required for smoking, and the subsequent sleep; expense, gradually exhausting a man's means, and driving him to the greatest shifts to satisfy his craving; the gradual sapping of the strength and vigour, rendering a man more and more unfit for the duties of life. 3rd. Morally; manifestation of anger under provocation; and I may add that the Chinese say, that as the use of alcoholic stimulants tends to make men hot-tempered and violent, so that of opium makes them given to lying, duplicity, and trickery. The habit of opium-smoking is more dangerous than that of taking alcohol, on account of the insidiousness of its approach, and the difficulty of escaping from its clutches. This vampire seems to suck all the moral courage out of a man. As to deeds of violence, opium must yield the palm to alcohol.”

What, then, was the material difference between opium and alcohol? They are all agreed as to this—that the inuses of alcohol were bad, but the dial difference was, that if you once

-enced opium-smoking, you could we it off; you are all but compelled to go on to excess. You may begin with a drachm or two a-day, and you may go on until you can consume no less than nine drachms a-day; and in that case it was positive death for it to be taken away. Thousands went to the opium hospital at Hangchow who had astringents given them in order to assist them to leave off the terrible habit of opium-smoking. Some could be cured in about three weeks, but there was no doubt very many went back to their former habits. Mr. Cooper was asked before a Select Committee of East India Finance, in 1871—

“Do you think, from your own experience in travelling over China, and investigating these matters, that the use of opium there causes as much public injury as the consumption of drink in England, as far as you can see?—Yes; I think that the effects of opium-smoking in China are worse than the effects of drink in England, as far as my experience goes.”

At the same Committee, Sir Rutherford Alcock was asked—

“Can the evils, physical, moral, commercial, and political, as respects individuals, families, and the nation at large, of indulgence in this vice be exaggerated?—I have no doubt that where there is a great amount of evil there is always a certain danger of exaggeration; but looking to the universality of the belief among the Chinese, that whenever a man takes to smoking opium, it will be the impoverishment and ruin of his family—a popular feeling which is universal both amongst those who are addicted to it, who always consider themselves as moral criminals, and amongst those who abstain from it, and are merely endeavouring to prevent its consumption—it is difficult not to conclude that what we hear of it is essentially true, and that it is a source of impoverishment and ruin to families.”

He felt he need not trouble the House with further evidence on this point. He thought in its moral effects there could be no doubt that he had proved opium-smoking was bad. Not only the abuse, but the use of the drug was bad, because if a man once took to smoking he could not leave it off. He had shown how degrading a habit it was, and therefore there could be no doubt, he thought, that it was liable to all the censure thrown upon it. On that score he thought he had shown that the Bengal monopoly must be injurious to the Government working it. Then there was the mercantile and international argument, what effect had it on our commercial relations with China, although our trade was improving, and was nothing compared to what it would have been if our policy harmonized with that of the Chinese Government. In return for their tea and silk we gave opium. This traffic affected our trade relations with 400,000,000 of men, and it could not give them a very high idea of those who forced the traffic upon them. For the sake of the amount of revenue derived from this opium traffic, were they content to alienate their trade from the great Empire of China? Did they forget the other side of the picture; that they had to pay large sums to stay famine in India, calculated on an average in amount of £1,000,000 sterling per annum, and yet they were content to give up vast tracts of the best land in India, some 750,000 acres, to the growing of opium? Suppose a new war was to break out, did they suppose what had been done could ever be done again? Would it be possible to do it? Would not Russia or America step in and say—"You have no right to impose these Treaties on foreign Powers which are weaker than you are; although you are stronger, you must not force your trade upon an unwilling people." Did they not see that this source of revenue rested on a very precarious basis? The crop was precarious. A shower of hail might destroy it; a peculiar blight—as actually happened in 1871—or three days' rain, falling at a particular time, would injuriously affect a sixth portion of our Indian Revenue, not to speak of the undoubted fact of the large increased area of cultivation in China. He thought, considering all these things, they had some right to ask the Government to thoroughly investigate this matter; not only to consider it with a view to make some small alterations in detail, but to make up their minds that this painful monopoly should cease, and that it never should again be repeated. His belief was that if gradually withdrawn the monopoly would not be found so productive of loss to the Revenue. The Indian opium, by its peculiar qualities, would always bring a high price in China, and a high export duty would limit the trade. We stood before the world on our trial. We must not only teach morality by precept, but by example. There was a general feeling throughout the world that something ought to be done in regard to this Bengal traffic, and that this was the time to do it. We were professedly the bearers of "peace on earth and goodwill towards men;" but in reality we were "sowing the wind," and leaving to others to "reap the whirlwind." We ought to throw off this odium, which must attach to the Indian administration as long as the Bengal monopoly was maintained. Imagine the Government of this country being the great distillers. Would the Government like to be in that position; would it be allowed to be in that position? No; the country would not allow it, because from a moral as well as an international point of view the monopoly was bad. Could we not confer with the Chinese Government as to regulating and restricting the trade? His hon. Friend who had an Amendment on the Paper (Sir George Campbell), and who had had so much experience in Bengal, appeared to him very nearly to meet his views. He hoped he would see his way entirely to do so. He also hoped his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for India had not been long enough in office to have his ears deafened and his eyes blinded to the facts which had been laid before him. He heartily thanked the House for listening to him. He had quoted high authorities, and he should only quote one more, but that authority was higher than all the rest, and one they were all bound to obey, whose words were Gospel truth, and applicable to nations as well as individuals: "Offences must come, but woe to him by whom they do come." The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. PEASE, in seconding the Resolution, said,* he was not insensible of the difficulties of this question, difficulties from which successive Governments had recoiled, and from which the late Government turned away in despair. New evidence and new light, however, had been thrown on the whole question since it was last discussed, and he hoped this new evidence would be brought to bear on the question by the present Administration. He was convinced from what he had read in the Reports and in the Papers, so kindly laid on the Table by the Government, that this was a question which every Government must face; because, if the Government refused to face it now, the difficulties would increase as years rolled on, and it would in the end face the Government. He had read the documents laid before the House from time to time on this subject, and he trusted in looking at them and in bringing the facts before the House, he would receive credit for not being actuated by any desire to use them merely to support his own preconceived views, or, indeed, any other than the most obvious deduction from the facts and figures which the Indian Papers and correspondence disclose. That the opium revenue had been a very increasing portion of the Indian Revenue had already been proved by his hon. Friend the Mover of the Resolution (Mr. Stewart). It now amounted to 16 per cent of the gross Revenue of India; but, as had already been described, that Revenue was drawn from two sources, and these two sources of a decidedly opposite character. First, there was the revenue which had been described as coming from the Bengal drug—that which the Government itself cultivated and sold, and, he was going to say, forwarded to China for the Chinese market, and which was subdivided into Behar and Benares, and the second source, a pass duty of £60 or 600 rupees per chest, on that which was shipped from Bombay, called generally Malwa opium. It was principally to the Bengal revenue that he wished to direct the attention of the House. He should have something to say about the other, but it was to that cultivated by the Government itself to which he wished at first to call attention. The manner in which the Government dealt with the trade, and the way in which the Bengal opium revenue was raised, were given in a few words by Sir Cecil Beadon in his evidence—

“2871. CHAIRMAN: Will you kindly state what offices you held in India?—I was Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Secretary to the Government of Bengal, and afterwards Lieutenant Governor of Bengal.

“3195. Has the existing mode of raising the revenue from opium been in force for a very long time in Bengal?—Yes; almost ever since the commencement of our rule in Bengal.

“3197. You know that the production of opium in Bengal has been gradually growing for a number of years?—Yes.

“3198. Will you state, in the first instance, as the system has been the same, what is the system generally under which this revenue is collected, and the administration under which it is collected?—I will endeavour to be as brief as possible. The Government have established two agencies, one at Patna and the other at Ghazee-pore, which are usually called the Behar agency the Benares agency; the head-quarters of one being at Patna, and of the other at “3199. In what mode is the land then selected for cultivation?—When any ryot wishes to cultivate opium he goes to the sub-agent, and asks to have his name registered, his land measured, and to get a cultivation licence, and the usual advance. The sub-agent makes inquiries, ascertains that the man is really bond fide an owner of land which he proposes to cultivate with opium, has the land measured, and then makes the advance upon the security of the person himself, to whom the advance is made, and his fellow-villagers. The advance is made shortly before the sowing season. The ryot then sows his land, and when the plant is above ground, the land is then measured by one of the native establishments, and if the ryot has sown all that he engaged to sow, he gets a second advance; if he has not sown so much, he gets something less in proportion; or, if more, he gets a little more. There is a sort of rough settlement at the second advance. Nothing further takes place till the crop is ripe for gathering, and when the ryot has gathered the crop he collects it in vessels, and takes it to the sub-agent's office; there he delivers it to the sub-agent, as the agent of the Government, and receives the full price for it, subject to further adjustment when the opium has been weighed and tested and examined at the agent's factory. The opium is then collected at the sub-agency and forwarded to the factory; there it is exposed for a considerable time in large masonry tanks; it is reduced to a uniform consistency, and made fit for the market, some for home consumption, and some for sale in Calcutta for exportation—the greater quantity for exportation. It is then packed in cases and sent to Calcutta, and in Calcutta it is sold by auction at periodical sales, and exported by merchants for consumption abroad.

“3205. Is there any regulation by which the Government limit the extent of the land so cultivated, or do they always accede to every request?—It is limited according to the financial needs of the Government; it is limited entirely upon Imperial considerations. The Government of India, theoretically at least, if not practically, decide how much opium they will bring to market; and, of course, upon that depends the quantity of land that they will put under cultivation and make advances for.

“3210. Are great precautions taken to prevent any person cultivating the land with opium without a licence?—It is absolutely prohibited.

“3213. So that you have no reason to suppose that there is any illicit cultivation?—There is no illicit cultivation at all.”

The largest portion of the whole of this opium, grown in India—Bengal opium—goes direct to China. In 1866, out of 8,604,000 lbs exported, 8,505,000 lbs were exported to China, costing £8,860,000 to the Chinese people. This trade had grown up within comparatively a few years. In 1834-5 the net opium revenue was £838,450; in 1844-5 it was £2,181,288; in 1854-5 it was £3,333,602; in 1864-5 it was £4,984,424; in 1872-3 it was £6,870,423; and in 1873-4 it was £6,333,597. So that it was now double what it was 20 years ago, and it was eight times what it was 40 years ago. He should next show how this revenue was divided.

Year.	Cultivation.	Pass Duty.
1834	2694,279	£144,171
1844	1,868,345	372,943
1854	2,232,411	1,101,191
1864	2,883,542	2,100,882
1872	4,259,162	2,611,261
1873	3,594,763	2,738,841

This clearly showed that the proportion of revenue derived from pass duty was steadily increasing. The quantity of land occupied was annually more. In the case of Bengal, in 1848-9 it was 388,000 beegahs; in 1858-9, 467,000; in 1868-9, 694,000; and in 1872-3, 828,000 beegahs, a beegah being five-eighths of an acre. The Revenue of India had become more and more dependent on the poppy trade, for whereas in 1800 to 1820 the gross opium revenue was £15,165,564, the gross total of receipts was £317,651,837—proportion 4.77 per cent; in 1860 to 1872 it was £101,920,436, the gross total of receipts was £607,780,270—proportion, 16.77 per cent; and the net opium revenue which in 1834 to 1844 was in Bengal, £10,261,927, Bombay, £1,975,300; total £12,237,227; percentage from Bengal, 83.88; percentage from Bombay, 16.12, had risen in 1873 and 1874 in Bengal to £7,853,925, and in Bombay to £5,350,102; total, £13,204,027; percentage from Bengal 59.48; percentage from Bombay 40.52. He was sorry to trouble the House with figures, but they were necessary to prove that more opium had been produced; that more land had been occupied; that India had become more dependent on this trade; and that the proportion derived from pass duty, had steadily increased. This history of the trade in this drug—he did not wish to use language too strong—was one of the darkest pages on the trading annals of a Christian country. So far as India was concerned, taking Bengal alone, the revenue was £3,594,673, and it was to that part of the trade that he wished to draw the noble Lord's attention. He did not propose to deal with the whole question, but with that part of India of which the Government was the direct cultivator, and the supplier of the money to cultivate. This question of the opium trade with China was by no means a new one. It was raised in the House of Commons by Lord Shaftesbury (then Lord Ashley), in 1843, in a speech showing great research, reflecting great honour both to his head and to his heart, replete with those benevolent feelings towards the human race which have ever marked his Lordship's character; and the noble Lord pointed out then its demoralizing effect upon the Chinese. His Lordship went through the whole question of the Indian trade with China, and though it must be frankly admitted that circumstances were wonderfully different now, yet the arguments then brought forward as to its demoralizing effects, applied with equal if not greater force in the present day. The importation of opium into China was then strictly forbidden, and Englishmen and English ships were engaged in smuggling it into China against the efforts of the Chinese. Lord Ashley at that time also moved a Resolution to the effect that the trade with China

The revenue at that time was £2,181,000, and the only argument brought forward against the Motion was one of money. The argument as to the demoralizing tendency of the trade was very much strengthened now, inasmuch as it now applied to a revenue of £6,000,000. Sir Robert Peel neither attempted to refute the facts nor the arguments of Lord Shaftesbury in that discussion, but asked that the matter might be left in the hands of the Government, and moved, as the late Government had since done, the Previous Question. In those hands it had since remained, in those hands it still remained, and in those hands the revenue derived from debauching the Chinese had doubled. Sir Robert Peel asked that it should be left in the hands of the Government, and pointed out that treaties were in course of negotiation which involved a considerable amount of delicacy, and that it would be inconvenient to interfere with the pending negotiations with China. The matter there ended, Whig had succeeded Tory, and Tory Whig; and every successive Administration, during the 32 years that had passed away since that time, had allowed this traffic to go on, damaging as it was to the English name throughout the world.

He hoped that the noble Lord would look into this state of things, and do what some of the ablest statesmen in England had urged preceding Governments to do, to set this matter right. In 1870 his hon. Friend who sat behind him (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) again called attention to this question in an excellent speech, which would bear repetition, but he would not now trouble the House with the allegation it contained, and moved that "This House condemns the system by which a large portion of the Indian Revenue is raised from opium." A remarkable speech was made in reply by the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), who again moved the Previous Question. His speech was one of the most successful ever made in the House. He would not for a moment say it was insincere. He reminded him of the Yorkshire horse-dealer's boy: with his foot in the stirrup he asked his master—"Do I ride to buy or sell?" His hon. Friend rode for his money and he rode well. He could not admit that he washed the blackamoor white, but he half hid him in the soap-suds. The hon. Member almost endeavoured to prove that the article was good for the Chinese and for everybody else, and that it would be unkind to deprive them of it, and that it was one of the greatest blessings a kind Providence had showered amongst us. He (Mr. Grant Duff) certainly did prove one thing, and that was that India stood in need of the money—that he (Mr. Pease) admitted. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs was backed up by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), with the many financial arguments which that right hon. Gentleman was so well able to bring forward. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"That the Chinese Government arrived at the wise resolution, that, under the circumstances of the case, it was not possible for them to struggle against an appetite so strong and a tendency so decided as that which possessed a large portion of the Chinese people, and, consequently, they determined to deal with opium as a commercial commodity, and to admit it into the country upon payment of a duty."—[3 Hansard, cci. 516.]

The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to draw a parallel between whiskey, tobacco, and opium, and finally concluded by stating that they wanted the money. It would be in vain for him (Mr. Pease) to point out inconsistencies in the House, because no one could be a good judge as to that, until he was aware of what was passing through the mind of another, and what another's previous convictions were on a subject; but he certainly was amazed that anyone who so well knew the history of the matter could have made such a speech as that. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly cognizant of the whole of our dealings with China on this matter. The Christian man knows that in this trade, and in the effect of this trade, every precept of his religion is violated—that it prevents the introduction of his religion into thousands of homes where it would be a blessing. The moral man knows that the consequences of this trade outrage every principle of morality and virtue. The statesman knows he is resting on a revenue on which he can place no reliance on a support on which he has no right to bear. Would any hon. Member in the House get up and say that the Chinese people spent £8,000,000 annually in the purchase of this drug as a medicine? It was absurd on the face of it. Lord Ashley produced in the House a great many statements relating to the effects of opium on the Chinese, and he would read one or two of them. Mr. Majoribanks, President of the School Committee of Canton, stated—

"That opium can only be regarded, except in the small quantities required for the purposes of medicine, as a pernicious poison. To any friend of humanity it is a painful subject of contemplation that we should continue to pour the black and envenomed poison into the sources of human happiness. The misery and demoralization are almost beyond belief."

Mr. Medhurst stated—

"Calculating, therefore, the shortened lives, the frequent diseases, and the actual starvation which are the results of opium-smoking in China, we may venture to assert that this pernicious drug annually destroys myriads of individuals."

Mr. Squire, Church Missionary Society, said—

"Never, perhaps, was there a nearer approach to hell upon earth than within the precincts of these vile hovels, there every gradation of excitement and depression may be witnessed. Let it never be forgotten that a nation possessing Christianity supplies the means."

The Rev. Howard Malcolm, United States, remarked—

"No person can describe the horrors of the opium trade. That the Government of British India should be the prime abettor of this abominable traffic, is one of the grand wonders of the 19th century. The proud escutcheon of the nation which declares against the slave-trade is thus made to leave a blot broader and darker than any other in the Christian world."

He would not weary the House with the repetition of authorities which were quoted in 1870. But there were fresh authorities at hand on whose words and evidence they could rely, and these he would be obliged to give, because if they did not prove that the drug was demoralizing to the Chinese, they had no locus standi. He would read to the House an extract from an essay written by a Chinese on the subject. The author wrote—

"China is in the centre of the world. It has been a very rich country, and powerful in arms. Now that it has fallen into poverty and weakness, though you say this is caused by the revolutions of destiny, under the direction of heaven; it must be admitted that opium has had much to do with it. A most base substance is exchanged for silver, the dearest of commodities. In a year, how many hundreds of thousands of millions of ounces are wasted in enriching foreign countries, and impoverishing China? 'The courtier and the noble, as well as the poor scholar and the labourer; the high and low, without distinction, all love opium as if it were their life. Opium is a most injurious evil. The full and fleshy, if they indulge in it, become thin; the strong become weak, though they do not at once die, they suffer the equivalent of death. Trade with foreign countries, originally intended to increase our wealth and supply the needs of the Government, has brought in opium, which costing several thousand million strings of money, it has supplied to the people to smoke, thus drying up our sources of wealth and exhausting our means of living. Daily the evil grows. How can our energy and our muscle fail to be wasted? Faults and failures, how can they be wanting?'"

These were the sentiments of a Chinese. Allusion had been made to a statement signed by 16 missionaries, which stated that the Empire and people of China are daily becoming more and more demoralized and impoverished by the increasing use of the drug. The moderate use of opium, granting that such a use is possible, is uniformly regarded by Chinese Christians as a sufficient reason for refusing admission to the Church, and though none of us enforce such a rule in regard to the use of spirits, we do all believe that the danger of excess is so much greater in the case of opium, that this rule in regard to it is necessary. The moral sense of the people of China, whether addicted to the vice of smoking opium or not, is opposed to the traffic, and condemns all concerned in the importation of the drug. These missionaries were often thought to be very good, but at times not very prudent men, and yet there was no question of their devotedness, and in many cases of their knowledge and ability. These men were paid by our constituents—many Members of this House subscribe largely to the funds which support them. They said to those people who used this drug which this country was sending in from India to China—"You are not to be admitted to the Christian Church." This country is deriving £6,000,000 sterling in India for the sale of the drug, the use of which kept its votaries outside the pale of the Christian Church. This seemed to him a strange consistency. Every one who had looked into this question must admit that it was nothing more than an immoral trade that we were carrying on with China. Every minister who had been called upon to deal with the matter, had resolved it into one question alone, that of money. It was idle to say that they must not attempt to reform the Chinese until they had begun reforms at home. It was for them to take care that their own hands were clean, and he was not attempting to argue the question of commencing reforms at home, or of reforming the Chinese. The only question he attempted to raise was as to the duty of Englishmen in reference to this particular trade. And on that point he said fearlessly, that as long as England followed this trade she was doing a huge moral iniquity, and that from the lowest of all motives—the sake of gain. As a nation they were pandering to the vices of the Chinese, and for money they were debauching a whole people. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Chinese Government adopted a wise policy when, finding they could no longer keep opium out of China, they put on a duty so small as practically to be no duty at all. Mr. Stewart had pointed out that in 1840 we went to war with China, and why was this done? Simply because the English were smuggling large quantities of opium into the country, and the Government was distinctly winking at the fact—nay, almost encouraging the practice. The Chinese blockaded our merchants at Canton, and seized 20,000 chests of opium, which they mixed with lime, oil, and rubbish of various kinds, afterwards trampling the whole mass under their feet, in order to show their detestation of the traffic; they knew, if they did not destroy, it would destroy them. England took her revenge by bombarding and destroying the town of this so-called fanatical people who hated and desired to put an end to the traffic in a poisonous drug. England gave the Chinese a lesson in Christianity by destroying them because they would not be poisoned, and then, after compelling them to pay for the smuggled opium which they had intercepted, Mr. Gladstone said the Chinese Government had adopted a wise policy. No statement or inference could have been more unfair to the wisdom of the Chinese Government. Three years after the war to which he had referred, Sir Robert Peel said, in reply to Lord Ashley, that he was endeavouring to obtain from the Chinese assent to a treaty under which opium would have been admitted; but it was not until 13 years later that the Heathens began to learn Christianity, and under the Treaty of Tien-tsin admitted opium at a duty to their country. What, however, did Mr. Wade, our Ambassador in China, say with reference to the business? Writing to Lord Clarendon, in May, 1869, Mr. Wade wrote as follows:—

“We are generally prone to forget that the footing we have in China has been obtained by force alone, and that, unwarlike and unenergetic as we hold the Chinese to be, it is in reality to ‘the fear of force alone’ that we are indebted for the safety we enjoy at certain points accessible to our force. . . . ‘Nothing that has been gained, it must be remembered, was received from the free will of the Chinese; more, the concessions made to us have been, from first to last, extorted against the conscience of the nation’—in defiance, that is to say, of the moral convictions of its educated men—not merely of the office-holders, whom we call mandarins, and who are numerically but a small proportion of the educated class, but of the millions who are saturated with a knowledge of the history and philosophy of their country. To these, as a rule, the very extension of our trade must appear politically, or what is in China the same thing, morally wrong, and the story of foreign intercourse during the last 30 years can have had no effect but to confirm them in their opinion.”

Later on, in May, 1869, there was a conference between Sir Rutherford Alcock and the Chinese Foreign Board, presided over by Wan Chang. Mr. Chapman, in his Minutes of the Conference, stated with regard to the Chinese Board, that—

“They proceeded to describe the horror entertained by all good Chinese, and by all the influential classes, of the effects of opium upon the Chinese nation; and said that real friendship was impossible, while England continued responsible for the drug to the Chinese people.”

Wan Chang repeated that the Chinese Government did certainly hope and desire that the British Government would agree to some arrangement for giving effect to the wish of China, for the discouragement of the consumption of opium by the Chinese people. He had also in his possession a very remarkable memorandum written by the Chinese Minister, but time prevented him from reading it to the House. It showed additional evidence of the fact that the Chinese Government had from first to last protested against the traffic in a drug which was sapping the vitals of their nation. Let the House think what would have been the effect of England endeavouring to force whiskey or gin, for instance, upon an European nation, as she did opium in the case of China, and compelling them to take the liquor at a nominal duty. It was probable that the result of such a course would be to involve England in a war with the country upon whom she attempted to force her spirits. But as China was a weak nation, almost to use Mr. Wade's words, England had introduced opium into the country by fraud, and was keeping it there by force. He therefore asserted strongly that the consumption of opium was destroying the people; that the Government of China desired to stop its importation. He would now proceed to deal briefly with the question of the Indian Revenue, as it was affected by the growth and export of opium. As a practical man, he thought nothing could justify his stating to Parliament what he thought should be done, unless he also pointed out how, in his opinion, it could be accomplished. Many persons would say that the character of the trade was so doubtful, that the revenue arising from it was so uncertain, and that there were so many things to be said against it, that if we could do without the money it would be better to abandon the trade; and so put a stop, as far as in us lay, to the evils by which it was accompanied. This was all very well as far as it went, but he wished those who could use this language to go a step further. There was a great difference between a State doing the trade themselves, and the same State receiving a revenue from those of its citizens who chose to cultivate and manufacture the drug. In the one case, the revenue resulted from the ordinary laws of supply and demand, and, in the other, it was derived from merchandize which we forced, as it were, upon the Chinese market. What was the position of our Indian Government with regard to the drug? They were in exactly the same position as the miserable victims of the drug themselves. They said as soon as they felt the pangs of hunger coming upon them in the shape of pecuniary want, "more opium," and the more the hunger came upon them, the more strong their craving for opium became. They found Indian Governors telegraphing to their subordinates to grow more opium; it was only the growth of opium would make our revenue easy. On the 22nd of April, 1869, the Hon. W. Grey, Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, writing from Barrackpore to Mr. C. H. Campbell, said—

"I have a telegraphic message from Simla, urging that every possible expedient that you can approve should be used even now to extend the opium cultivation next season to the greatest possible extent."

Sir Richard Temple, in a Minute dated 27th April, 1869, wrote—

"I am clear for extending the cultivation and for ensuring a plentiful supply. If we do not do this, the Chinese will do it for themselves. They had better have our good opium than their own indifferent opium. There is really no moral objection to our conduct in this respect."

He might remark that the last sentence of Sir Richard Temple's Minute showed that he was struck with the idea that after all there might have been a moral objection to the business. Mr. Grey, again, on the 29th of April, 1869, urged increased cultivation, remarking—"This would just suffice, and no more, to put us on smooth ground again." Thus they had the spectacle of a Christian Government ruling in India, and sending more opium into China: and just in proportion as our financial needs require, we raised our revenue by debauching the Chinese people. Let the House look at a parallel case. Imagine England, which levied duty on Irish whiskey, having all the Scotch distilleries in her own hands, and telegraphing to Scotland that, having compelled France by force to consume our whiskey, and to admit it at a very low rate of duty, more grain must be grown, and more whiskey distilled. Such a thing would not be tolerated in Europe for a moment. There might be degrees in morality, but this forcing Indian opium upon the Chinese was many degrees worse than would be the forcing of Scotch whiskey by England upon France, because, as the House had already heard, the consumption of spirits was not nearly so deleterious to a people as the consumption of opium. This was not the first time that this view of the question had been brought before the House. On the 10th of May, 1870, the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) moved a Resolution on the subject, and on that occasion the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), who was then Under Secretary of State for India, admitted that—

"Of course, there was a great deal to be said against this Bengal monopoly on politico-economical grounds. He supposed no one would invent such a system now-a-days; but we did not invent the system—we inherited it."

After some further observations, the hon. Member went on to say—

"As it was, no one, except those who had been working the system all their lives, was, so far as he was aware, particularly enamoured of the Bengal monopoly."—[3 Hansard, cci. 507-S.]

He had been told that if it was immoral in a State to cultivate opium, it was also immoral for a State to allow it to be grown under a pass duty. He agreed with this proposition, but he had rather to do with the State than with individual members of it; and if the trade was an immoral one, the question was only one of degree and of the State getting out of an awkward scrape. The first step to be taken then was to get rid of the Bengal monopoly, by putting the trade all under one system of pass duty, and then to go on raising the duty until India was prepared to do without the revenue, and the trade could be got rid of altogether. Of late years the Indian Revenue had shown increased vitality, and he sincerely hoped it would go on in the same direction until the Government would be able to dispense with the income derived from opium altogether. As a State we stood in a somewhat difficult position. We might say to the cultivators—"You may cultivate as long as you like; we desire to suppress the trade." Knowing at the same time that if the growth of opium was put an end to, the ground used for the purpose would be applied to the growth of things that, instead of destroying, would sustain life. With regard to the financial effects of a system under which the Government would desist from the growth of the poppy and discourage its cultivation, by private planters various opinions had been expressed. Sir William Muir, in a Minute dated February 22, 1868, described the probable finances of an experiment under which the Government should abandon cultivation and leave the production to private individuals, imposing a pass duty on the drug in entire substitution for the Bengal monopoly. He pointed out that in Bengal the production was 48,000 chests, and in Bombay 35,000, upon which a duty of 700 rupees per chest would yield £8,500,000, which, allowing £2,000,000 for correction, would leave a net revenue of £6,500,000. After stating these figures Sir William Muir concluded with this remarkable sentence—

“The change would relieve the British Government from the odious imputation of pandering to the vice of China by over stimulating production, overstocking the market and flooding China with a drug in order to raise a wider and more secure revenue to itself, an imputation of which at least on one occasion I fear we are not wholly guiltless.”

Mr. Reid, Chief Commissioner of Customs at Bombay, held the same opinion in very clear language. He said—

“The disadvantages of the Government monopoly are so clearly pointed out that its further retention will surely find no advocacy, and its death knell may well be sounded.”

In 1869, too, Sir R. N. C. Hamilton wrote—

“My recommendation is that Government should withdraw from the cultivation and throw it open to the public, to anybody who chose to cultivate it.”

If further evidence were needed, he might go into the evidence in which Dr. George Smith, when examined before the India Finance Committee, described the means he would recommend for working out the Government system of cultivation. In 1870, Lord Sandhurst—then Sir William Mansfield—wrote—

“We are now certified that the cultivation of opium has immensely increased of late years, and is increasing in many provinces of China.”

Further on the same authority wrote—

“We gathered from Sir Rutherford Alcock, when sitting with us in Council, that the Chinese look on this raising of duty as but the first step of the policy of exclusion of Indian grown opium. I arrive then at the conclusion that, whatever the cause, whether it was the moral one or the economical one, the Chinese have commenced a policy which is very hostile to British interests. As a matter of policy, I believe it would be wise for the Government to relieve itself of the burden of the manufacture and sale of Bengal opium.”

These were all strong opinions on the part of leading men in India, and he trusted their advice would have its due weight with Parliament and the Government as represented by the noble Marquess at the head of the India Office, and the noble Lord his junior. He felt that if the Government did not face the matter at an early date, the matter would come again so prominently before them, that it would not be by any means easy to deal with. The cultivation of opium in China had been alluded to, and he believed it was the fact that the Chinese had determined to throw the Indian opium trade back upon India. They said, in effect—“If our people are to become demoralized by the use of opium, we may as well grow it ourselves, for we can grow it 40 or 50 per cent cheaper than it is grown in India.” Sir Rutherford Alcock's statement on this point amounted to the fact that—

“He had found that the Chinese authorities had come to the resolution that unless steps were taken by the British Government to check the importation of opium, to drive the Indian drug out of the market, both by absolute prohibition of its import and the encouragement of the poppy cultivation and the manufacture of indigenous opium, he was convinced that these were their intentions and that they had power to carry them into effect.”

These opinions were expressed by Sir Rutherford Alcock in his report to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal on the Treaty of Tien-tsin, and in the same document he referred to Mr. Gubbay's letter of the 29th of November, 1869, which showed that in the Province of Sechuen, the opium crop had risen from 3,500 piculs to 50,000. Again, Sir Henry M. Durand went at length into the question of Chinese growing opium, and expressed his opinion that it must in the end drive Indian opium out of China. He (Mr. Pease) thought, then, he had proved how odious the traffic was to the Chinese, how steadily it had increased from year to year until recently; how the cultivation had been pushed; how steadily the pass duty on opium had increased; and how the Indian statesmen had agreed that the duty system should be the only system, and the Government should altogether abandon the cultivation of opium. He therefore trusted that recommendations which had been made would be carried into effect. It was clear that the Chinese could produce opium cheaper than it could be produced and exported from India; and he hoped he had also proved that for the sake of our Indian Revenue the State was pandering to Chinese vices; that the Revenue was becoming more and more dependent upon this vice, and that it was becoming daily more and more precarious in its character. He thought everyone would agree with him that there was a very decided difference between the State cultivating and selling the drug, and the State leaving the cultivation in the hands of private individuals, taking a duty upon the export merely. Lord Sandhurst had expressed an opinion, that as a matter of policy it would be wise for the Government to relieve itself of the burden of the manufacture of Bengal opium. He would like much to see this done and the trade swept away root and branch; but he was bound to admit that at present there were causes which would render this impossible, from the point of view of policy. He maintained, however, that we could do as a matter of duty that which Lord Sandhurst referred to in the light of policy. Let them follow up this policy by steps, in order to destroy a trade which was only profitable in proportion as it destroyed. There was no man who could look back upon the history of our dealings with China without agreeing with him that it was one of the blackest pages in our trading history. He could only, in conclusion, express an earnest hope that our future policy towards the Chinese might not be one of feeding their depraved appetites, but might be one of aiding the good and enlightened among them to stamp out a vice that both the Christian religion and the axioms of heathenism alike condemned.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is of opinion that the Imperial policy regulating the Opium traffic between India and China should be carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government with a view to the gradual withdrawal of the Government of India from the cultivation and manufacture of Opium,"—(Mr. Mark Stewart.)

—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had recently had some official connection with the opium traffic, and he therefore considered it proper that he should express his views to the House regarding it. He had placed an Amendment on the Paper to the Resolution of the hon. Member for the Wigton Burghs (Mr. Stewart), which by the forms of the House he was unable to move; but he would read it to the House, as it stated the views he held upon the question. It affirmed that the House was of opinion that the system under which opium was manufactured and sold by the British Government in India should not be extended, but, on the contrary, should, as far as circumstances permit, be gradually restricted. He had sympathized very sincerely with much that the Mover and Secondor of the Resolution had said; and would at once admit the perfect fairness which both hon. Gentlemen had evinced in placing the subject before the House. It seemed to him, however, after all, that the question was a practical one. It was not whether the evils attending the consumption of opium were great—undoubtedly they were—the question was, how those evils could be remedied. Large sums were derived from opium by the Indian Government; but he maintained that the Indian Government had had nothing whatever to do with forcing the traffic upon the Chinese. If forced it was upon them, that Government had totally dissociated themselves from the transaction. Both in the past and at present the matter was one between the British merchants and the Chinese, and the Indian Government had had no part in it for many years. Looking at the matter from an Indian point of view, the question was a more simple one. He had considered the subject a good deal, and it appeared to him that the relative evils of opium and alcohol were very much on a par. Both undoubtedly were very bad; the one was the vice of the West, and the other the vice of the East, and it was impossible for any man to say that one or the other was the worst. He thought that they might treat this simply as a matter of race, and that as the Aryan races preferred alcoholic drinks, so the Turanian consumed opium. It had often been urged that, as regarded the opium traffic, it was a cursed thing, from which they were bound to withdraw altogether as speedily as possible. He would venture to say that that was not a practical view of the matter, and he would ask how were they to shake themselves free? Only by one of two courses—they could either allow the trade in opium to be free, or prohibit it altogether. Now, what would be the result of allowing free trade? He maintained that the sale would be greater, that enormous injury to the population would be produced, and that there would be a loss in the Revenue. The other course was to prohibit the cultivation altogether. He was not prepared to say that was a wrong course; indeed, a great deal might be said in favour of it. But was the House prepared to take that course? When the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had not only carried his Permissive Bill, but when the manufacture and use of alcohol were entirely prohibited, it might then be possible to suggest the prohibition of the cultivation of opium; but it was totally impossible that the poppy cultivation should be prohibited, and our Indian Revenue should be sacrificed, for the benefit of the Chinese, while the alcohol of Britain was allowed free scope. We did not leave the traffic in alcohol free, but we checked it by a very heavy taxation. Opium was one of those things upon which the imposition of a heavy duty enabled us to serve God and Mammon at the same time — doing good to our neighbours by checking its consumption and raising a large Revenue for ourselves. That was a view that was really accepted by hon. Members who had dealt with the subject, and until they were prepared with another system they must continue to tax the drug, and the only question that then arose was the form in which it was to be taxed. He would say that after all, whether the tax was imposed in the shape of an export duty, or by a monopoly like the tobacco-monopoly in France, or other systems of a similar kind, it was a tax raised upon an article of consumption. He had no hesitation in saying that, if he saw his way to do so, he would do his utmost to get rid of this monopoly system, and confine himself to the duty only. At the same time, he would say, from a long and intimate acquaintance with this system, and having seen both sides of the question, that he believed that the monopoly did in practice work well, and it was more unseemly than injurious. The Gottenburg system, under which the public authorities regulated the liquor traffic so that as little harm as possible should be done to the community, was precisely analogous to the system followed in Bengal with regard to the opium traffic. Before the present system was abolished they ought to be shown a better one to substitute for it. The opium revenue was of very great importance to India, and there would be much risk attending changes. We derived a large revenue from opium, and the financial condition of India at the present time was not such as would justify us in running great financial risks for the sake of an idea. So far from being in a flourishing state, our Indian Revenue barely sufficed to make both ends meet, and it certainly was not in a condition that would enable them to sacrifice any part of it. As to the position of the ryots, there was no pressure whatever put upon them to grow opium, and under a different system they would probably fare worse than they did at present. In the same districts as those in which opium was grown the manufacture of indigo was carried on by private speculators, and the ryots engaged in that industry were not by any means free, for they were under a sort of feudalism. If a system of duties were adopted in regard to opium it would probably be necessary to interfere with the course of free trade—to lay down strict regulations as to where opium ought to be grown, and to take great precautions against smuggling. Thus, the proposed change involved other than purely financial considerations, and it would be most injudicious to take any hasty step in the matter. If it could be proved that good would be done by the sacrifice, he would assent to it; but he did not think that any good would be done if the income they derived from opium were swept away. At the same time he would not extend the monopoly system, and when some years ago it was proposed to extend it, he had opposed the suggestion, and it was not carried out. He would restrict the system to the places thoroughly well accustomed to it, and carry out the duty system whenever it was possible. That was the view which he held formerly as an Indian official, and which he had now to urge as a Member of the House of Commons. The Government of India would, he hoped, take the matter into their consideration. The truth was, the greater part of the opium revenue was derived from those districts in which monopoly was established, and it was necessary in any action which might be taken that great caution should be observed. In the case of Behar and Benares it would, he thought, be better to wait until we had seen the result of a change in other parts of the country, where the revenue to be risked would be very much smaller in amount. If the change proved successful in those quarters, then it might be extended, and we might thus ultimately be enabled to get rid of monopoly altogether, although he did not think the time when we could do so had yet arrived.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he supported the Resolution, which he thought exceedingly mild and cautious. He thought there was no necessity for warning the House not to proceed with too great haste in the matter, seeing that this was the advice given more than a quarter-of-a-century ago, and that the result of the action which had been taken with respect to it was, that the evils of the trade had increased something like four-fold. It was, he might add, idle to contend that there was no difference between the two modes employed for levying a revenue from opium—one of which was to lay a heavy duty on the export of the article, thereby discouraging the trade; and the other the cultivation of the article by the Government itself. There was all the difference between the two modes that existed—between the nation becoming a distiller, and levying a tax on spirits when in the still. As to perfect free trade in opium in India, no one had suggested it. In former debates in that House it had been admitted that great evils sprung from the manufacture of opium and its compulsory exportation to China, on the inhabitants of which country it was forced, according to Mr. Wade, against their conscientious convictions. A very serious responsibility rested on this country in the matter, and it was, therefore, our duty to do, as soon as possible, everything that lay in our power to clear ourselves from the effect upon the nation and the world of a belief in our criminality in this trade—a trade which was contrary to the feelings and to the interests of the whole Chinese people. Our prestige did not rest upon mere physical force, but also upon moral grounds, and he urged that something ought to be done at once to show that we were taking the subject into our serious consideration, with a view, at any rate, to clearing ourselves from the responsibility which hitherto attached to us. The Chinese had been resisting this traffic with all their power, whilst England had been doing everything it could to force it upon them; and the only intelligible argument he had ever heard advanced in support of such a course on our part was that the traffic was yielding us a large Revenue. It was simply a question whether our moral reputation was not worth more than even the large sum we were deriving from the opium trade.

MR. LAING said, that having given that question much anxious consideration when he was Finance Minister in India some 12 years ago, he wished to address a few observations upon it to the House. Those observations, fortunately, would be short, because much of what he had intended to say had been said already very ably by the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), who from his former position as Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, spoke with great authority on that subject. He might say generally that he agreed to a very great extent with the remarks and the line of argument of that hon. Member, only he felt somewhat more strongly than that hon. Member did the impolicy of any attempt to interfere in accordance with English ideas or English sentiments with the practical administration of affairs in India; and he had more confidence than, perhaps, that hon. Gentleman had in the good sense of the House and of the English people, when fairly appealed to, not to attempt to import English ideas into the Government of that great Empire, and, above all, into its financial administration. He had great respect for philanthropy which was philanthropy at its own expense, but little for philanthropy which was philanthropy at the expense of others. If they endeavoured, on account of some conscientious scruple, to force measures on the Government of India which would cause a sacrifice of between £6,000,000 and £7,000,000 of Revenue, they ought to say whether they were prepared to make up for that loss, or for any part of it. How was it proposed to supply the deficit? Were they prepared to pay the bill, or any part of it? If not, who was to pay it? Surely not the poor Hindoo ryot. If the Government of India were to double or even treble the salt duty it would not suffice, and he did not suppose any philanthropist would recommend such an expedient as that of taxing a necessary article consumed by the people for whom we were responsible, for the sake of those who indulged in a drug, and for whom we were not responsible. After repeated attempts to impose it, the income tax had been withdrawn, to all appearance finally; and as to that tax, it had not at the very highest produced more than a fourth of the sum derived from opium. Was it desired that they should unsettle the land settlements and break faith with all the cultivators of the soil in order to increase the Land Revenue—which it would be necessary to do to the extent of 25 or 30 per cent, if they wanted to make up the amount of the revenue from opium? Or were they prepared to allow a heavy import duty on Manchester manufactures? They would not by that means get nearly what they sacrificed, but it would be an evidence of sincerity. No one could suppose, however, that such a duty would be tolerated by this country. Some practical substitute must be shown, and it must be a substitute which would not fall upon the vast and poor population for whom we were trustees. For his own part, his opinion was identically the same as that of the hon. Baronet, for he had arrived at the conclusion that the case of opium and that of alcohol stood substantially upon the same footing. The same arguments that were used against opium might be used against gin and whisky. As to the prevalent idea that a man who took a small quantity of opium felt compelled to increase the indulgence to an extent utterly ruinous, it was no more true than it would be to say that every Scotchman who drank a glass of whisky became a confirmed drunkard. Of course, there were opium smokers in the large towns in China as there were whisky drinkers here, who ruined themselves, but when they came to regard the consumption of a great nation, £8,000,000 sterling worth of opium being consumed every year by the population of China, would any one say that that enormous quantity was consumed by men in this deplorable condition? He had often heard it said that it was common to see the Chinese workman, when his dinner hour came, sitting down under a tree and taking his meal, and, after it, swallow a minute quantity of opium—just as an English labourer might smoke a pipe—and in 10 minutes more get up and resume his work. If a man did a great deal of hard work in the open air a little opium, like a little alcohol, did not seem to have much effect; but, no doubt, it was a very different case in the stews of great cities, where the indulgence was carried on to a ruinous extent. The truth was that there was much to be said upon both sides. The intoxication caused by opium was less violent in its character than that occasioned by alcohol, and less crime was committed in Singapore under the influence of the former than there was in this country under the influence of the latter. It was very easy, of course, to get up evidence as to the frightful effects of opium, but such evidence could not always be implicitly relied on. At Singapore, while the Chinese took their opium, the Europeans drank arrack, and the Native population took tobacco and betel nut. It was found that the Chinese were worth three of the Natives, and therefore it could not be said that the human frame deteriorated under the influence of the nervous stimulant which they so freely used. Under the circumstances were we in a fit of virtuous indignation to destroy so productive an Indian industry for the sake of moral considerations, while we continued to raise the greater part of our own revenue from alcohol? It would be most unjust if we were to bethus cheaply virtuous at the expense of 200,000,000 of the poor toiling wretched ryots of India, for whom we were the trustees, and whom we ought to endeavour to raise in the scale of comfort and of civilization. As to the mode of collecting the revenues, he disapproved altogether of the proposal to abolish the Government monopoly on opium, and to raise a revenue from the drug by means of an export duty. A very important argument in favour of maintaining the present monopoly was, that it was the means of regulating the supply and consequent price of the article in China. If they abandoned the Government monopoly there would be great variations in the price of opium. In the event of their running the price up exceedingly high, in the first instance the Government of India might gain by it, but the inevitable effect would be to lead to the ruin of the trade by occasioning vast fluctuations in the price of the drug and by encouraging Chinese competition, and it would give rise to a large amount of smuggling. The revenue which we derived from opium was not a precarious one, but was a continually increasing one, being based on the growing demands of a large portion of the human race. Having by the accident of circumstances almost a monopoly of that article in India, we wisely and properly took advantage of that fortunate circumstance to alleviate the burden of taxation upon our immediate subjects in India. Those who wished to abolish this source of revenue ought to show what other practical course they proposed to substitute for it. He regarded the great danger to our Indian Empire as being not Russian aggression, nor Indian disaffection, nor another Mutiny; it would arise from the wish to govern India from home in accordance with Indian ideas and English sentiments. As far as he knew, every time that English public opinion had been so brought to bear as to interfere and overrule with the action of those who were responsible in India for the government of India, the result had been disastrous. He asked the House, therefore, to beware how they did anything of that sort in the dangerous matter of Indian finance. His experience showed him that, however much to be applauded were the motives of hon. Gentlemen who brought forward Motions like the present, in nine cases out of ten they did harm rather than good. Let the best men be selected for the government of India, then let the responsibility rest on them, and they would find those gentlemen infinitely more likely to be right than hon. Members here at home could possibly be. He deprecated any attempt to prescribe to the Government of India a course the practical effect of which must be inevitably to lay a further heavy burden upon the already severely-taxed people of India.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, the House ought to accept with all respect the caution given it by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, experienced as he was in the affairs of India. At the same time, he (Sir John Kennaway) asked himself whether the hon. Gentleman had not gone too far in deprecating any interference in the affairs of India on the part of the House of Commons. The policy recommended would be a retrograde policy from that which was adopted when England took the responsibility of governing India out of the hands of the East India Company. He quite admitted that the present was a great financial question, and that the loss of Revenue would be a very serious matter. But the moral reputation of England ought to be dearer to the House than her financial reputation, and if the system under discussion was wrong, it ought to be terminated, no matter what might be the consequences. Whilst we took a high moral tone with the Sultan of Zanzibar and with other foreign rulers, we could not well ignore the question of whether what was being done was morally right or wrong. The objection made was not to the raising of a revenue from opium, but to the mode in which it was raised, the Government undertaking all the functions of trader and speculator, and encouraging the growth of what was admitted to be a noxious drug when money was not abundant. With regard to the Chinese, an unjust distinction was, he thought, drawn between the responsibility of the Government of India and of the Imperial Government. That responsibility was one, and could not be divided. There was a very strong feeling amongst the Chinese on the subject, for they regarded the English as responsible for the drug coming into their country by the peculiar mode in which its growth was encouraged and fostered, and would not do anything towards admitting our trade and manufactures whilst we continued our present course of proceeding. Moreover, the time had come when the Chinese might demand a revision of the Treaty of 1860, and insist upon closing their ports, and we should have great difficulty in resisting their demand. In such a course they would be backed by the Americans who, at that time, sent their Navy to protest against the opening of the ports, and it was very likely that Russia might back up such a demand. What was asked of the Government of India was that they should gradually withdraw from the production of opium, and limit their experiment to the raising of revenue by a licence, and surely that experiment could be tried in one portion of the country. The House had now before it a moderate proposal which, as it did not ask for the entire abrogation of the duty, was not open to the charge of rashness in sacrificing a large revenue, but which asked the Government to proceed tentatively to redress a moral wrong. Upon the grounds, therefore, both of the immorality of the thing and of the possibility of the opium revenue being brought to an end, it was advisable that the Government should cease to regard the opium traffic as a permanent source of revenue, and he thought that, under the circumstances, the House would do well to support the Motion.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that having been employed in the first War of 1840 with China, and usually, but unfairly, called the Opium War, and having gained some information when employed in that country subsequent to the War as Consul, upon the opium trade, he felt much confidence in saying that as the Chinese had never shown a real and sincere wish to prevent opium from being conveyed into that country, he considered it right to be cautious how we forced our reforms on a nation disinclined to the reformers. He happened to be present in 1843 at Hong Kong after the first war with China, when an offer was made by the two Chinese Commissioners, Keyung and Whang, who, after their visit to Hong Kong, and on their return to Canton, wrote out on board the steamboat, and sent the written proposal by our then able Chinese Secretary, Mr. John Morrison, to Sir Henry Pottinger, stating that if the British Government would agree to pay the sum of $3,000,000, we might introduce into China any quantity of opium that we liked. He recommended Sir Henry Pottinger to avail himself of that offer, because he foresaw the difficulty which would be caused by the opium traffic. [Mr. MARK STEWART: When was that offer made?] It was made in July, 1843. The document relating to it, and which was submitted to Sir Henry Pottinger by Mr. Morrison, containing the translation of the Commissioners' proposal, was written in his house, and was now a part of a Parliamentary Paper, laid before Parliament so far back as 1857. He (Sir George Balfour) a few months afterwards sailed for the North China Sea, and established the port of Shanghai, which was one of the five ports allowed to be opened under the Treaty of Nankin. He selected this port in spite of the disadvantage of its being then a great mart for the sale of opium, which was introduced into China by Chinese, who took the opium out of vessels outside the port, but because, being a central part of the Empire, he was confident that a vast commerce would spring up with that part of China. The opium traffic was, as he had anticipated, the cause of trouble, because it was carried on at the mouth of the river that led up to Shanghai. He (Sir George Balfour) was comparatively young at the time, and his feelings were certainly against forcing the opium into the Chinese territory against the will of the Chinese; and was then well inclined to prevent those evils which the improper use of opium caused. But so long as the opium vessels which then sailed under other than the English flag kept beyond the jurisdiction of the Consular office which he held at Shanghai, there was no power or pretext to interfere with this traffic, which the Chinese, openly it may be said, carried on with these vessels; but on three British vessels inside the limits of the port mixing themselves up in it, then the conditions were changed, and he thought that he had a duty to perform as an official of the English Government in preventing British subjects violating the Chinese prohibitory laws, and he seized these three vessels for contravening, as he thought, the laws of China. A very proper censure was, however, conveyed to him by Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary, and which was in part set forth in the Parliamentary Return above referred to, for undertaking to perform duties for the protection of China and its people which belonged to the Government of China to discharge, but which they showed neither inclination nor wish to perform. Sir Henry Pottinger was succeeded by Sir John Davies, who, in one of his despatches in the Return quoted, stated that Captain Balfour, at Shanghai, reported that the local Government had no desire to receive information as to the evasions carried on in the opium traffic. He ought also to mention that in the year previous, during the negotiations at Nankin, Sir Henry Pottinger had frequent communications with high Chinese authorities about the opium trade, and it was undeniable that the Chinese officers were very indifferent indeed with regard to the opium traffic.

Having served in China during the first War, he must remark on the statement of the hon. Member for South Durham, (Mr. Pease) that he should never have thought of being accused of carrying on a war with China on account of opium. That war was, no doubt, occasioned by Commissioner Lin, who opened the crusade against opium; yet the cause of the war was not opium, but the forcible seizure of our merchants who had a right to live in Canton, and to carry on their trade there, and who were forcibly detained, along with our Representative, as prisoners, and forced to give up property to save their lives. There was at present a Member of the House whose firm was obliged to give up a stock of opium at Canton which had not only not been brought from Calcutta, but not even purchased from the Government of India. No more injudicious act than that forcible seizure of our merchants to give up opium could have been committed by Lin, because the opium trade, which had up to that time been confined to the mouth of the Canton River, afterwards spread over all the rivers in China. After all, less evils were caused from the consumption of opium than from the use of ardent spirits. Our 80,000 chests of opium sent into China were quite insufficient to bring about all the serious consequences with which the opium trade was charged. No doubt, the abuse of opium was productive of great evil, but so also was the spirit produced in foreign countries and imported into the United Kingdom with the consent of the people of this country, or rather with that of Parliament. In China it was different. Opium was prohibited, but yet it is said to have been freely used in the Imperial Palace. Mr. Wade and Sir Rutherford Alcock have both borne testimony, in the strongest terms, to the laxity of the Chinese authorities in resorting to the measures necessary to carry out their assumed hostility to the opium traffic. As to the reported extensive and increasing cultivation of opium by the Chinese themselves, he did not believe it. The same thing used to be said when he was in China; but, as far as he could judge, the cultivation of opium had been very little extended since that time, and no country in the world could produce opium to compare with that of Malwa, Benares, and Patna. No doubt, with this superior kind of opium the inferior China and Turkish opium was mixed, and it might be that adulteration was now better known and more extensively used with the large increase of the supplies of Indian opium, which were doubled since the first war with China. This augmentation might have given rise to the notion of increased cultivation in China; but even if true, the fact only showed the laxity of the Chinese officers in respect to this produce, now prohibited to be either grown or imported. With regard to the demand that India should change its present practice of levying a large Revenue from the opium exported to China, he would beg the House to bear with him when he pointed out that, having served in India, he knew that several Ministers had endeavoured to grapple with the question, but none of them had had either the skill or the courage to try an experiment with the Revenues of the country derived from opium. That Revenue amounted to nearly one-eighth of the total gross Revenue of India, and more than one-seventh of the net Revenue, and bore nearly the same proportion as that of the Excise on spirits to our entire Revenue. It was thus a most important item, and one that few would have the boldness to treat with in the easy way now urged in the House. He knew of statesmen who had most anxiously desired to modify the present monopoly of Bengal opium, so as to levy a toll or an Excise tax, as on the opium; but it was far more difficult, if not impossible, to do so with the opium of Patna and Benares than it was with the opium of Malwa, owing to the geographical character of the Provinces being so different. Further, he (Sir George Balfour) would point to the fact that Sir Charles Trevelyan went to India in 1862 almost pledged to change the Bengal system, but found it impracticable. And Sir Bartle Frere, one of our ablest and most pure-minded statesmen, earnestly and sincerely directed his close attention to this opium question, but abstained from changes, though he had the support of Lord Canning; and although the present Finance Minister (Sir William Muir) was opposed to the opium traffic, he (Sir George Balfour) did not believe he would be able to make any change. The question was purely one of finance, and he could not see the possibility of raising by other means the amount that was derived from the manufacture and export of opium. He thought, on the whole, that the best course would be not to press the Motion now before the House, but to leave the matter for the present in the hands of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, who might, in the course of a year, as the result of continued investigation and thought, hit upon a plan which would solve the difficulty.

MR. E. NOEL said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wick (Mr. Laing), that it would not be possible to govern India by English ideas, seeing that we had to deal with a people in utterly different circumstances to ours; and, therefore, to deal with them as if they were a free people like ours, was utterly impossible. It was, however, news to him that we were not to deal with the people of India on a moral basis—and that, though we were to treat them as an Oriental people, and not as a Western one, we were not to consider in dealing with them the great principles of morality. He utterly repudiated such a doctrine as that. It was said that the opium question was not to be dealt with, because the people of India were not to be called upon to pay for the whims of England. He agreed with that; but he would remind the House that it was an English whim in the interest of an English company which first called upon India to raise a revenue by the growth and export of opium. The question how the Revenue of India could be raised if the cultivation of opium by the Indian Government were stopped, was the great difficulty; but the House ought to stimulate the Government to see if they could not grapple with that difficulty by finding means to raise the Indian Revenue without encouraging the traffic in opium. It was the opinion of many Indian statesmen who had looked into this question, that we might restrict the area on which at present the Government made advances to the Bengal ryot for the growth of opium, and that if certain districts were left free for speculators to go into this trade, we might not at once be called upon to lose that great amount of revenue which it would be almost impossible for an Indian Financial Secretary at this moment to deal with. It was known that Sir William Muir was anxious to have the cultivation of opium by the Indian Government stopped, and that he believed he would be able to discover means of meeting any deficiency in the Indian Revenue which would be occasioned by that course; but it was not likely that he would undertake the task unless he was supported by a strong expression of enlightened opinion at home. It was, therefore, the duty of the House to pass a Resolution which would encourage Sir William Muir in the good work which he was desirous of undertaking. If the Government would show a desire to put an end to the Government monopoly, our relations with China would be improved, and this dreadful blot would soon be removed from our escutcheon.

MR. W. W. BEACH said, he wished to make a few remarks on this subject, as he had been a Member of the Indian Finance Committee. His wish was that an end be put to this immoral traffic in opium, but he feared there were difficulties connected with the question which must necessarily exist. As an independent Member of the Committee he studied the subject with the most profound attention. As to the Chinese, we were not responsible for their tastes, any more than they were for the tastes of some of our own countrymen. He feared they had had for many generations a pernicious taste for opium, as in this country some people were given to alcoholic liquors. The opium grown in India had a flavour which the Chinese liked better than that of the opium grown in China, just as the Chinese tea was superior to that grown in India; and the anxiety of the Chinese Government to stop the importation of Indian opium was not so much owing to their wish to promote the morality of the Chinese people, as the growth of Chinese opium. With regard to the comparative advantages of the State selling the chests of opium or of levying an export duty, from the evidence given before the Committee it was abundantly plain that while the one system was adapted for the Western part of India, the other system was best adapted for the East. The opium exported from Bombay had to be carried by long journeys over land, and therefore it was easy to prevent smuggling, and an export duty might be imposed upon it; but the case was far different when it was transported for a short distance by water. He feared it would be extremely difficult to change the monopoly system into an export duty system, as the result would apparently be to encourage illicit traffic to the detriment of the revenue; but still the subject was well worth inquiring into, and if the authorities could see good grounds for altering the system, such a course would be of the greatest public benefit.

MR. M'LAREN said, the Resolution moved by the hon. Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Mr. Stewart) was quite explicit. No one could mistake its meaning; it was that that House should gradually withdraw from the opium traffic between India and China. The Amendment proposed to that Resolution was, however, a very different thing. The hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkealdy (Sir George Campbell), arguing in favour of the Amendment, seemed to indicate every possible way to diminish the traffic and put an end to it; and then having set up one plan after another successively, he knocked them all down, and seemed to show not only that there was no room at present for anything to be done, but no probability of anything arising in future. He (Mr. M'Laren) considered the speech was the most out-and-out defence of the opium system he ever heard advanced. We had done a great moral wrong in forcing that drug on the Chinese, and he considered the Treaty the most iniquitous one that had ever been forced on any foreign country. With that view, his remedy was exceedingly simple—abrogate this forced Treaty at once. No doubt, the quantity exported from India would gradually diminish; but it would not diminish all at once, and in time the Government would be no worse off than now.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he did not think the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. M'Laren) was aware what would be the result of abrogating the Treaty. Sir Rutherford Alcock had expressed a very decided opinion that if the Chinese were left unfettered by the Treaty they would at once expel—if they did not exterminate—all the Protestant Missionaries from the country. The hon. Member surely was not anxious to bring about such a result as that? There had been that evening a most interesting discussion on the whole question of the opium revenue and trade of India. His hon. Friend who introduced the Motion (Mr. Stewart) suggested that certain alterations should be made, and that the system of excise and export duty now in force in Bombay should be tried in Bengal in place of the monopoly system at present existing there. His hon. Friend seemed, however, to argue against any revenue whatever being derived from opium.

MR. MARK STEWART explained that he did not argue against prohibition at all, but wished to do away with the Bengal system and to substitute for it the system which was in vogue in Bombay.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, it certainly seemed to him that his hon. Friend's words implied direct condemnation of any revenue being derived from opium. One fact must have struck hon. Gentlemen who had listened to the discussion as being very remarkable. There had, indeed, been a complete conflict of opinion between hon. Members. Every speaker who had had any official experience of India pointed out the danger, if not the impossibility, of abandoning the revenue; whereas hon. Gentlemen who had advocated the abolition or alteration of the mode of raising the revenue, and who were doubtless actuated by the best of motives, looked at the question merely from a philanthropic, and not from a practical point of view. Two fallacies underlay the statements of both his hon. Friends who had brought forward this Motion. They appeared entirely to forget, in the first place, that there was no nation in the world which did not in some shape or other take stimulants. Secondly, they forgot that in a large portion of Asia—not only in China, but also in Assam and Burnah—the stimulant taken by the natives was opium. We drank beer, the Irish and Scotch took whisky, Americans chewed tobacco, and the Chinese smoked opium. The latter took opium because it was the form of stimulant best adapted to the climate in which they lived. Sir Rutherford Alcock pointed out that there were certain medicinal properties in opium which made it sought for by the inhabitants of marshy and malarious districts, and hon. Members who lived in our own fens must be aware that there was a large consumption of opium and laudanum in that part of England. Such being the case, it was not fair to put upon the Indian Government the responsibility for the immoderate use of opium by the Chinese. It had been assumed that it was entirely owing to the action of the Indian Government that the Chinese smoked opium. Why was the smuggling of opium carried on? Because the people wanted it. Was it likely that it would be grown in India and that merchants would take to smuggling unless there was a strong disposition on the part of the country to which it was sent to consume opium? Mr. Cooper and Sir Rutherford Alcock pointed out that the habit of opium smoking had existed in China for centuries. It was perfectly true that in Eastern China the opium chiefly used there came from India; but Mr. Cooper stated that he had travelled all over Western China, and found that the people there cultivated opium more extensively than in the other parts of China, and yet in Western China Indian opium was almost unknown. If he might venture to suggest it to his hon. Friends who differed from him, he could not help thinking that they accepted too readily the instances of persons who made an immoderate use of opium, and drew from it a general deduction that every one who indulged in it was completely demoralized, physically and morally. There was very remarkable evidence bearing on this point. There could be no question that the Chinaman who smoked moderately could do an amount of work which no native of any other country could perform. There was a very remarkable report which had come home quite recently from a Consul in China whose territory was in the western part of the Empire, and who once held opinions similar to those expressed that evening. This gentleman had at first partaken of the nearly universal belief that the use of opium was entirely demoralizing to the individual who was addicted to it, and he gave his experience, which was extensive, and which induced him to alter his opinion. During his journeys he came into the closest relations with men who smoked. Their work was of the hardest and rudest—and the attention of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was called to this—they had constantly to strip and plunge into the stream in all seasons. The quantity of food they ate was simply prodigious, and the two most addicted to the habit of smoking were the pilot and the ship's cook. On the steadiness of nerve of the former the safety of the junk depended, and yet they seemed to be almost independent of sleep or rest. The Consul added that though he did not wish to say that opium smoking did no harm, his opinion with regard to it had been much modified, and he was bound to admit that it could be smoked without injury. This was testimony of undoubted reliability, and the result arrived at was the same as the decision previously arrived at by other persons. Mr. Cooper, in his evidence, said that the habit of smoking was very prevalent among the Chinese. He said that if you suddenly cut off the supply of opium, one-third of the whole nation would die; and he added that so long as it was used in moderation, it was not detrimental to health, and that the people who smoked it were able to perform an enormous quantity of work. He might quote another important authority, who declared that the Chinese would have opium; that if the Indian Government prohibited its growth and export, no good would be done; and that the Indian Government conferred a great benefit on that part of China to which they imported opium. One of the great evils of China was over-population, and if the opium was not imported, the Chinese would cultivate it in place of cereals and other food. He was aware that opium smoking was prohibited in China under pain of death. Who was the Emperor who passed that law? He was the Sir Wilfrid Lawson of China. He was a man determined to put down the use of opium and all stimulants, and seeing his son one day smoking he instantly ordered his head to be cut off. This law, however, was now a dead letter, and no one attempted to enforce it. He hoped his hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would draw some little deduction from this excessive prohibition, for he had little doubt if his hon. Friend was successful in enforcing his particular principles his descendants would find that the law in which they were embodied was equally disregarded. Two different lines of argument were adopted on this question. They were told on the one hand that the source of revenue was precarious, inasmuch as the cultivation of opium was extending in China; and, on the other hand, they were told they must prohibit the importation of opium into China, because it was owing to the Indian opium that the Chinese people were perishing. Something of the same kind was put forth in a pamphlet which he held in his hand, and which was published upon the authority of the Anti-Opium Society. In a statement made this year, and signed by 16 Chinese Missionaries, it was said that the growing demand for foreign opium had been checked by native cultivation, and that it might cease altogether from that cause, while the consumption increased. But having made that remark, they went on to make this most extraordinary suggestion—

“There is now, therefore, an opportunity for Great Britain, by a noble act of self-sacrifice, giving a check to the consumption of opium in China by checking the supply.”

That was surely a most inconsistent argument. The real fact of the matter was, that whether they stopped the importation of opium into China or not, the Chinese would have opium; and therefore it was not fair or accurate to place on the head of the Indian Government all the evils which ensued from the immoderate use of opium. As to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire, that they should abandon the Bengal and adopt the Bombay system, he did not see if it was wrong to derive any revenue from opium, why it was right to get it by excise or import duties. His hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) considered this a proposal for sacrificing a considerable portion of revenue for an idea. He quite understood that there might be certain hon. Gentlemen who considered it wrong of the Indian Government to associate themselves in any way with the cultivation or manufacture of opium; but if he could show that every one of the evils which the hon. Member deprecated under the present system would be increased ten-fold by the proposal the hon. Member made, and that the amount of opium that would be imported must be doubled or even more largely increased, he thought it would be admitted that the suggestion made was not one which would be adopted by even the supporters of the Anti-Opium Society. In Assam the people were allowed to cultivate opium, and the result was the whole population became demoralized. That was because there was no restriction, no regulation, no control exercised, and women and children were in the habit of sucking rags saturated with the drug, a mode of consuming the drug most deleterious, and resulting in almost perpetual intoxication. Unlimited cultivation of opium was therefore now abandoned, and a new system had been adopted in Bengal, by which the persons engaged in the cultivation of opium were the healthiest and sturdiest of the population. Therefore, the first way in which his hon. Friend would improve the condition of the people of India would be to demoralize a large portion of them. Then as to the next point. In the Finance and Revenue Accounts of India we had in one page the net revenue derived from the system in Bengal and the system in Bombay, and in the next the total number of chests raised each year in both those Provinces. From these accounts there was this remarkable fact apparent—that though the number of chests annually sent from Bombay very frequently exceeded the number sold in Bengal, yet in only one single instance was the revenue from Bombay in excess of the revenue from Bengal. But there could be no question, if the proposal of his hon. Friend were adopted, that one-third of the net revenue derived from opium in Bengal would be lost. In 1872-3 the output of opium in Bengal was some 42,500 chests, and the net revenue £4,259,000. The output in Bombay was 44,000 chests, or some 1,500 in excess of that of Bengal, and yet the revenue was £1,600,000 less than in Bengal. Therefore, the first result of the proposal of his hon. Friend would be a very large loss to the revenue, which should be made up by increased production. Accordingly a very much larger quantity should be carried into China or there would be a large loss to the revenue. Then there was another point. We found it necessary to state in Calcutta each year the quantity of opium to be sold in the next year, and thus a degree of certainty was introduced into the trade. Bombay was dependent on the Bengal trade, and if we rendered the output uncertain, it would be impossible to depend with any accuracy on the supply from Bombay. It would fluctuate, as had been already pointed out, by millions, from year to year, and therefore it would be impossible to adjust the balance between income and annual expenditure. But every financier of eminence had laid it down that if you wished to adjust your expenditure to your income, you must know, with some degree of certainty, what your income is likely to be. There were, therefore, four objections to the proposal of his hon. Friend. The first was, that it would demoralize the people, the second, that it would cause the loss of a large amount of revenue from Bengal, the third, that we should introduce an element of uncertainty into the income, and the fourth, that we should never be able to adjust our expenditure to our income. He quite admitted that if the Government of India could raise their revenue otherwise, it would be better not to raise so much from opium. But we were a practical people and must adopt practical methods. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Laing) had said that we should not attempt to govern India from the House of Commons by abstract Resolutions. He agreed with that opinion. It had been said that Sir William Muir was most anxious to surrender this revenue, but he could not do it. Why? Because he was the Finance Minister of India. It was urged that he would be supported by the enlightened opinion of the House of Commons. But the enlightened opinion of the House of Commons would not furnish him with resources, nor relieve him of his responsibility as Finance Minister. It might be wrong to smoke opium, but why was it proposed to enter upon a course of policy which would increase the burden of taxation upon those who did not smoke opium? No doubt, the expenditure of the Government of India had increased very much during the last 10 or 15 years. His experience was, of course, limited; but he felt bound to say he did not see any prospect of materially reducing that expenditure. We had to maintain a large European Army in India, the whole strength of our administration there was European, and the cost of importing Englishmen for our administration and our Army was annually increasing. But if this opium revenue be abolished, we must do one of two things—either largely reduce our expenditure, or impose additional taxation on the people of India. Which alternative would his hon. Friend accept? If we largely reduced the expenditure, we must put a stop to measures which were largely adding to the moral and material prosperity of the country. One of the pleas for our remaining in India was that we were giving the people a better Government than they ever had before. But if you reduced the revenue, you at once cut away from yourselves the power of doing much for the amelioration of the condition of the people. He admitted, however, that when so large a portion of revenue depended upon the habits of a foreign nation, a revolution might occur in their habits which might make it difficult to realize that revenue hereafter. He therefore quite agreed with the line of argument of his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), who had pointed out that the system on which opium was manufactured should not be extended, because the revenue was to a certain extent precarious. At the same time he hoped he had given the House sufficient practical reasons for rejecting the Motion of his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend had come forward as the Representative of the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade. If the Motion of his hon. Friend were adopted, what would be the result? The Revenue would be greatly diminished, and in three or four years he might come down again and ask, as it was now so low, what was the use of retaining it at all? If the House adopted the proposal of his hon. Friend, it would be possible for him to take that line of argument. He therefore felt bound, on the part of the Government, to offer his decided opposition to the Motion.

The House divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 57: Majority 37.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

VOTES ON ACCOUNT.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £1,122,600, Further Vote "on account" of the following Civil Services, for the year ending 31st March 1876. [Then the several Services set forth.]

Mr. GOLDSMID complained that such large sums should for the second time this Session be taken on account. He objected to the system, which he considered was destructive to Parliamentary control, and was surprised that the Government should adopt it after the views they had expressed whilst in Opposition. They had really gone beyond their Predecessors in the matter of Votes on Account, for they came down now at the very end of the month of June to ask for a second Vote on Account of more than £1,000,000, which would carry them on to the end of July. He wished to hear something from the Secretary to the Treasury on the subject, so that the House might know what to expect for the future.

Mr. W. H. SMITH quite agreed that the practice of asking for second Votes on Account was exceedingly undesirable, and one which every Government ought to avoid; and he admitted that he had with his hon. Friends opposed the late Government in this practice. But the Government were not now asking for anything more than their Predecessors asked during all but the last Session of the last Parliament; and the Vote now proposed was only for the month now drawing to a close. Whilst regretting very much that the state of Parliamentary Business this Session had delayed Supply, he trusted that the assurances which had been given by the Prime Minister would satisfy the House that there was no intention on the part of the Government to withdraw from the House any part of its control over the expenditure. He would endeavour to remedy the objectionable state of things for the future.

Mr. GOLDSMID said, that, after the fair and candid statement they had just heard, he would not offer any further objection to the Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £260,000, Further Vote "on account" of the following Revenue Departments, for the year ending 31st March 1876:—

Post Office Packet Service ..	80,000
Post Office Telegraphs ..	180,000

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(3.) £25,201, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission (including Endowed Schools Department).

(4.) £15,083, to complete the sum for the Civil Service Commission.

(5.) £13,904, to complete the sum for the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission.

(6.) £6,500, to complete the sum for the Inclosure and Drainage Acts Imprest Expenses.

(7.) £34,125, to complete the sum for the Exchequer and Audit Department.

Mr. GOLDSMID said, that if he were correctly informed there was a very large expenditure in the Office of Works—namely, that for Palace furniture—which did not come under the control of the Audit Department, and asked whether, if such were the case, it would not be advisable to have a real and not an imaginary audit? The whole expenditure of the country ought to come under the same system of audit.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, he was surprised to find that the hon. Member for Rochester was under the impression that the accounts of the Board of Works were not audited, because in point of fact they were subjected to a very minute and careful audit. He was far from depreciating the care and authority of the auditor, because, unless his duty was most effectively exercised, the audit would lapse into a mere farce. There was therefore an earnest desire on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself to do everything they could to make the accounting for public funds as perfect as possible.

Mr. GOLDSMID thought the hon. Gentleman did not give any explanation on one part of the question he asked. According to previous arrangements the Chief Commissioner of Works was constituted the auditor of the accounts of the Board of Works, but now it was transferred to the Secretary; so that, in point of fact, the spending officer was the auditor of his own accounts. Therefore, he maintained that the new arrangement was very unsatisfactory.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, he was Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee at the time the change alluded to was made. The hon. Member for Rochester was mistaken when he attempted to draw a distinction in every Department between the spending and the accounting officer. It would, he believed, be found that there was no such distinction. The Committee recommended that the Treasury should look through the whole of the Civil Service, and appoint a civil servant of the highest class to be the accountant of each Department. It did not occur to them that the political chief of a Department was a proper accounting officer.

MR. GOLDSMID expressed himself still dissatisfied with the explanations given.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the accounting officer had to satisfy the Controller and the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee that the expenditure had been properly incurred.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR urged that the present arrangement in regard to appointing the Secretary and Senior Assistant as the special accountant of the expenditure of the Chief Commissioner of Works, was objectionable, and that at the Office of Works they had a wrong officer to account for the money. It was not so with regard to the Board of Trade, and other offices; the head of the Department was the accountant, and the proper one for all expenditure; where the duties were onerous, as in the case of some offices, then a subordinate officer was selected to account for the money. The Works Department, on the contrary, had the officer appointed for this duty, who was specially charged with the duty of aiding the Chief Commissioner to look after the proper outlay of all public monies, but by being made the accountant, he had conflicting functions to perform of having one day to advise, and the next day, to see to the propriety of the expenditure.

MR. WHITWELL called attention to the increase in the Vote for the second section of the second-class clerks of the directing branch from £2,905 to £4,895.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had noticed the discrepancy, but it arose from the higher amount paid to those in that department.

MR. BUTT called the Chancellor of the Exchequer's attention to the fact that, owing probably to inadvertence in drawing the Act for the abolition of the Commission of Audit and the appointment of a Controller and an Auditor General, the accounts of certain local bodies which were formerly audited by the Commission now might undergo no audit at all.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that when the new system was established, the functions of the Controller and the Auditor General were confined to public accounts and such accounts as the Treasury might specially direct to be audited. In consequence of that there might be local bodies which had slipped out of audit altogether; and he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was exceedingly desirable that some provision should be made for the audit of local accounts.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £2,198, to complete the sum for the Registrars of Friendly Societies.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH inquired whether any alteration would be made in the amount of the Vote, in consequence of the Friendly Societies Bill if it passed into law?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought it was not probable that any change would be made in the Vote.

MR. MELDON wished to know upon what principle the Registrar of Friendly Societies in Ireland, who received £150 a-year salary for his services, also received an allowance of £100 a-year for a clerk? He should also like to know whether he produced any voucher for the £100 a-year alleged to be so paid?

MR. SULLIVAN: Some of us happen to know that these offices are farmed out.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I should be exceedingly happy to get any information from hon. Members that would enable the Treasury to reduce the charge.

MR. BUTT: I am bound to say that the gentleman who fills the office of Registrar to Friendly Societies in Ireland would be the last man who would be guilty of playing any trick upon the Treasury. He is a gentleman who fills the office with credit, and in a very honest, honourable, and conscientious manner.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR pointed out how the account could be checked, by merely seeing whether the allowance was actually paid away on a voucher signed by the clerk, employed by the registrar, or whether it was a personal allowance paid to the registrar on his own signature, leaving to him the responsibility for having the clerical labours performed in the way most economical and convenient to himself.

MR. MELDON repeated his question how it was that the registrar who was paid £150 a-year for the performance of his duties put down an allowance of £100 a-year additional for his clerk.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not know in what way the Registrar in Ireland arranges; but this I do know—that it is true that the Registrar performs his duties in a very efficient and satisfactory manner, and that he is a very able man.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £521,529, to complete the sum for the Local Government Board.

MR. DILLWYN asked for an explanation of the sum of £2,000 paid to the medical officer?

MR. GOLDSMID inquired how it was that there was a decrease of £730 in the salaries of Inspectors of Work-house Schools, a most meritorious class of public servants?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the medical officer of the Local Government Board was under the control and order of that Board. A salary of £2,000 a-year was secured to him by Act of Parliament, he having enjoyed that as medical officer to the Privy Council, and a further sum of £2,000 a-year was assigned to him for the pursuit of scientific inquiries. The medical officer had some functions in connection with the Privy Council in regard to any cases which might arise in the administration of the Medical Act, which came under the purview of that body. The reason of the decrease referred to by the hon. Member for Rochester was, that two Inspectors who were in receipt of the higher scale of salaries had left during the year, and their places had been filled by Inspectors whose initial salaries were considerably lower.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Butt

(10.) £11,804, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commission.

(11.) £40,550, to complete the sum for the Mint.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked for information in reference to the state of affairs in that Department, and complained of the designs of the coinage. He also called attention to the report of the deputy master that the machinery of the Mint was inefficient.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought he ought to say a few words about the condition of the Mint. There was no doubt whatever that the present machinery of the Mint was not in a very satisfactory state, and he believed that nothing but a complete renewal of the machinery would meet the exigencies of the case. The deputy master was of opinion that it would be impossible to make the necessary alterations on the present site, and that they ought to provide a new site, with a new Mint containing a new machinery of a proper character. If that were done, no doubt the present site could be disposed of and a considerable sum realized. Objection had been taken by the lawyers to the selection of a site in the neighbourhood of Blackfriars, but no refining would be done there, and therefore no nuisance would be created. However, as the objection had been raised, he had been considering the practicability of securing a suitable site elsewhere. He had made inquiries with reference to a suitable site, but was not at present in a position to indicate the spot which might be chosen, as he did not know the amount for which the land might be purchased.

MR. ANDERSON trusted the right hon. Gentleman had found a site which would not be too expensive, and that it would be properly protected.

(12.) £12,780, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

(13.) £16,650, to complete the sum for the Patent Office.

(14.) £17,161, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office.

(15.) £17,270, to complete the sum for the Public Record Office.

(16.) £3,799, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission.

(17.) £33,901, to complete the sum for the General Registrar's Office in England.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

INFANTICIDE BILL.—[Bill 43.]

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Whitwell.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 22nd June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

Amendment proposed in page 1, line 16, to leave out the words "and shall thereby cause its death."—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. GOLDSMID moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. CHARLEY said, he hoped before the Motion to report Progress was agreed to, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris would be accepted. The Recorder, the hon. Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), and the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) had all urged upon him its acceptance, and he felt it impossible to resist the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Thursday next.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Bill to provide for additional payments to Teachers of National Schools in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH and MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 223.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

—(The Lord President.)

EARL FORTESCUE: I hope the deep interest which I have for many years taken in middle-class education, and in school endowments as most influentially affecting it, may plead with your Lordships for your kind indulgence to me during the few remarks I propose making upon the working of the Endowed Schools Act up to this time. My noble Friend the then President of the Council may perhaps remember that some 11 or 12 years ago I was honoured by being made the channel for communicating to him the earnest hope, expressed by several friends of education, including Members of both Houses of Parliament, who met at my house, that a Royal Commission might be appointed to inquire into the educational endowments throughout the country. We were not long after deeply gratified by the announcement of the appointment of such a Commission, and still more by its admirable composition. For we learnt that it was to be presided over by my lamented Friend (Lord Taunton), one of the noblest, most patriotic, single-minded, and enlightened public men I ever had the happiness of knowing, and it was to comprise several other statesmen since distinguished in the service of the Crown, as well as other men conspicuous for their acquaintance with educational questions. Nor was the Report which they presented three years afterwards, in December 1867, unworthy of the expectations raised by the high character of the Commissioners. Founded upon a long, careful, and, I may truly say, exhaustive inquiry into the endowed schools and school endowments of the country, it was most able, elaborate, and statesmanlike, both in its description of their actual state and in its recommendations for the future.

Perhaps you will allow me to remind you of the general outline of the comprehensive scheme proposed in it. After proving a general prevalence, even beyond what had been suspected, of abuse, misuse, and disuse with regard to these endowments, and revealing an unexpected amount of difference both as to their number and value between one part of the country and another; after demonstrating that unless endowed schools are compelled to do good work, they will often do positive mischief by standing in the way of better institutions; and after showing how the Charity Commissioners, ably and efficiently as they had generally done their work within the limited scope of their powers, had been estopped by the nature of their duties from considering the educational endowments of any district in relation to each other, or, indeed, from dealing with any case otherwise than isolatedly and separately on its own merits alone; they proceed to state their reasons for the conclusions which they had arrived at—namely, that the schools ought to be remodelled on a system; that in order to effect this in the best way they ought to be dealt with in groups, and that it would be necessary to sub-divide the country for this purpose; that counties would make the best ultimate divisions, but that for the present the Registrar General's eleven larger divisions ought to be taken; and that within each division the schools should be assigned to the three grades, into which they proposed that all schools below the great public schools and above the elementary schools should be divided. And then they go on to say—

"Some Provincial Authority such as we shall hereafter suggest should be charged with the duty"—which cannot be entrusted to the governors of the schools themselves—"of determining in what grade each school is to stand."

And the Provincial Authority is to do this "by fixing absolutely the age at which boys are to leave," and "by laying down certain limits" as to "the fees to be paid and the subjects to be taught," so as to check schools from practically rising or falling out of their assigned grade. With regard to religious instruction, they report that it might be left to some Provincial Authority to choose in certain cases between two specified forms of rules on the subject. Whether a school is to have boarders or not is, they say, "a matter to be settled by some Provincial Authority." They state that—

"After Parliament has laid down the general principle, the precise regulations with respect to the master's remuneration may well be left to the local authorities."

Again, they say that—

"To change the conditions on which exhibitions are at present held recourse should be had to the Provincial Authority."

"The same authority should also be empowered to sanction" various other changes with regard especially to exhibitions, where

"the various circumstances of the various endowments would have to be considered, and this a Provincial Authority would be well able to do."

As to the question whether schools in certain cases should be kept as boarding schools, or converted into day schools, they say—

"The proper authority to decide would be a Provincial Authority, capable of thoroughly understanding and appreciating local claims, and yet not hampered by the tendency to consider them alone."

And they conclude their long and carefully-reasoned out description of the duties and powers of the proposed Provincial Authority thus—

"The Provincial Authority would be, in our opinion, the proper body to draw up new schemes for the regulation of schools within its province, and submit them through the Charity Commissioners, or some Central Authority, to Parliament."

I think it is not too much, therefore, to say with the first Commissioners under the Endowed Schools Act, that "the system of the Report" of the Schools Inquiry Commissioners "mainly rests" upon the establishment of Provincial Authorities, subject on some points—and on some points only—to the control of the Central Authority above them, which the Report recommends to be established; but with the head masters and School Governors within their respective provinces subjected to them on many more points: an appeal being reserved in certain cases only to the supreme Central Authority.

The late Government, in their Bill of 1869 (brought in, be it remembered, in the same Session with several other important measures, which had precedence over it), took only two parts, and kept only one part, of the comprehensive scheme of the Commission of Inquiry—namely, the appointment of a Commission with very large powers for dealing with the educational endowments of the country. For they left out altogether the most important part, in my opinion—the constitution of Provincial Authorities; and they early dropped that of the Central Educational Council. But as in the Preamble of the Bill, which was introduced by one of the Commissioners who had signed the Report, they had implied the intention to carry out the scheme contained in that Report; and as the then advanced period of the Session forbade all chance of carrying more than a short Bill before the Recess, we many of us fondly hoped and believed that the Act of 1869 was only the first instalment of early, systematic, and complete legislation on the subject. Very probably they really meant to do so; and Mr. Forster's character for straightforwardness strengthens that impression. But be that as it may, the fact remains that from that day to this neither the late nor the present Government have taken any step towards completing the work on the lines recommended by the Inquiry Commissioners.

I have at various times since, and even during, the passing of the Endowed Schools Act, endeavoured to impress upon this House and successive Governments the great importance of carrying out as a whole, and not merely partially and piecemeal, that comprehensive scheme. And I ventured to predict the failure of any other mode of dealing with a problem at once so large, so complicated, and so delicate—so large; because it concerns at least £20,000,000 of property in money and land, and its application to the efficient promotion of education, and especially of middle-class education: so complicated; for it concerns trusts and emoluments of almost infinite variety in date, in character, and in circumstances: and so delicate; for it concerns multitudinous administrative bodies, scattered haphazard over the country, with very strong, though diverse, personal, family, and local, vested interests. I have no intention of reopening the somewhat warm debates of the last two or three Sessions with regard to the composition or operations of the Commission appointed by the late Government under the Act of 1869. They laboured hard and conscientiously. But they were called upon to do work, which the Commission of Inquiry had declared could not be satisfactorily or efficiently discharged by any central authority alone: for that Commission said—

“The necessity of dealing with schools in groups seems plainly to imply the corresponding necessity of local Provincial Boards to deal with them.”

And this I will venture to add, without fear of contradiction; that the first Commissioners under the Endowed Schools Act went beyond the expectations held out by the authors of that Act. For they soon began to startle this House and the country with the sweeping character of their earlier schemes; and it was only after receiving several rude checks from this House that they, with avowed reluctance, entered upon quite an opposite course; and disappointed me, amongst many others, by the hesitating, desultory, and unsystematic character of their later proposals. Indeed, in their Report of 1872, they allow that they had tried to deal with schools in groups, but had practically found it too difficult to do so. They, therefore, determined to give up all idea of carrying on their operations in that way, and thenceforth to treat each case, as if it were an isolated one, separately on its own merits. The consequence has been that they perpetuated in several cases by improved organization, and practically originated in a few cases by resuscitation, in different parts of the country, exactly the unsystematic and unsatisfactory state of things with regard to endowed schools, which the Report so forcibly deprecates; multiplying, to please the trustees, first-grade schools, where there were already enough, and leaving large tracts of country utterly deficient in schools of the grade required there.

Will their successors do better? Their names, when announced in Parliament, justly commanded public confidence.

Sir James Hill was well known for his able and judicious work at the Charity Commission, within the limited scope of its powers. Mr. Longley had done good service as Poor Law Inspector, and had gained the confidence of every district successively placed under his charge. My noble Friend Lord Clinton was also favourably known both for his official work at the India Board and for his usefulness in his own county. They may, and I hope will, profit by the exposure of some of the errors of their predecessors. But I boldly say they cannot do well. For, like them, they have work given them to do which, in the words of the Schools Inquiry Commissioners—

“cannot really be dealt with by a central authority alone; but requires the co-operation of a local body, which, as a matter of course, must be capable of looking at the county, or, perhaps, several counties, as a whole; but which shall know the district well, and not act, in mere dependence, on the reports of its officers.”

And now what is the present position of the question? I have ascertained that only a third at most of the vast property yielding more than £600,000 a-year, comprehended under the head of educational endowments alone (to say nothing of others) subject to the Act of 1869, has yet been disposed of; either quite irrevocably by schemes already legally in force, or else by schemes in such a stage as no longer fairly to admit of being now interfered with. And though, no doubt, some endowments might have been very much better applied, if the comprehensive scheme for dealing with schools in groups had been followed, I think I may safely say no great harm has yet been done: and we are still in time. But every month makes a difference, by disposing for ever of more and more of the magnificent property available three years since for the systematic spread of Secondary Education. I say disposing of finally and for ever: because, under the new scheme, schools will no longer be so disgracefully robbed or perverted as to afford just ground for public indignation, or to enlist public opinion in favour of their being otherwise dealt with. They will be far less assailable hereafter in their respectable misapplication than hitherto in their scandalous abuse. We are still in time: but only just in time. And I would earnestly entreat Her Majesty's Government to seize the golden opportunity before it is too late. If I am asked how this could now be done without legislation for the purpose impossible at this period of the Session; I would answer from the experience of a voluntary committee of some 30 or 40 in my own County, comprising most of the chief landowners and the Bishop, with a certain number of clergymen, yeomen, and tenant-farmers as representatives of the more important educational endowments, which met to propose a scheme for the whole County to be submitted to the Endowed Schools Commissioners. I was much surprised and gratified at the diligent attendance at our meetings, and at the amount of response soon given to appeals for a spirit of sacrifice of petty local interests to the general good of the County. I would venture to suggest, without pretending to speak of their legal powers for the purpose, that the Government with the aid of the Lords Lieutenant, could easily name Educational Councils, fairly representative in their character, either for their several counties, or for registration districts comprising two or more counties, as recommended by the Inquiry Commissioners; and could assign to these local Councils instead of to the Central Commissioners, the duty of considering schemes after conference on the spot with the trustees of the different school endowments to be dealt with in those counties or districts, previous to the final determination of the Commissioners and of Parliament. And I feel confident from our Devonshire experience that some such Councils would act very usefully and greatly smooth difficulties. I myself should prefer a County basis for dealing with these, as with various other local matters; “because,” in the words of the Inquiry Commissioners “each county is a whole by itself, and has a political and social life of its own.” But the question of the best division is, for the present, unimportant. What is vitally important is to commence action before it is too late. Before concluding, I must again earnestly appeal to the Government to interpose at once and determine that the remaining two-thirds of the vast property left by the munificence of our ancestors for educational purposes shall be wisely and systematically distributed so as to assist to the utmost in providing throughout the country sound and economical secondary education for generations yet unborn. Let it not be within the next few years all irrevocably disposed of—squandered, in fact, not corruptly, but wastefully—by a continuance of the same desultory, unsystematic, and unsatisfactory action, which has hitherto unavoidably characterized the course of the Commissioners under the Endowed Schools Act.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND hoped that, in consequence of the great amount of Business on the Paper, the noble Earl would excuse him if he did not follow him in a discussion on the general question of the administration of the endowed schools; and he would now tell his noble Friend what he did not like to tell him in the course of his speech—that he was out of Order. The Bill before their Lordships did not deal with the general question, but merely carried out a certain arrangement in respect of vested interests. When last year the Government felt obliged to adopt the unpleasant course of doing away with the old Commission and appointing a new one, he stated the reasons which induced them to adopt that course. The new Commission had only been at work six months, and it was impossible to say yet whether its schemes would be satisfactory or not. He hoped, therefore, that his noble Friend would excuse him for not going further into the subject.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(NO. 136.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that at the outset he wished to divest the minds of their Lordships of a misapprehension with respect to the extent and purpose of the measure. In many quarters the Bill was supposed to be designed as a settlement of the great sanitary questions which had of late been so much discussed; and that it was intended to be a complete and conclusive measure. Had it been so intended, no doubt the Government would have been fairly open to the criticism that they had not redeemed the pledges they had given at the commencement of the Session that they would devote a large portion of their energy to legislation in respect of sanitary matters. But both of these statements were based on erroneous assumptions. The Bill was neither a complete nor a conclusive measure. What it purported to be was neither more nor less than a measure to amend and consolidate the existing sanitary law. The Bill certainly was a large one, for it contained 340 clauses; but, startling as that number of sections might appear at first sight, he thought that a printed Paper which had been circulated among their Lordships must have shown them that the Bill was not as formidable as its bulk might seem to imply. In order to explain what was proposed to be done by the Bill, he must bring under their Lordships' notice the various Acts at present in force on the subject; but he did not think he need go back farther than the year 1848. In that year there was considerable alarm in this country in consequence of the threatened approach of cholera. Mainly actuated by that fear, the Parliament of that day passed the Public Health Act. That Act was chiefly applicable to towns; but it did not come into operation unless a certain number of the ratepayers called for it, and the central authority, the General Board of Health, was of opinion that it ought to be applied. There was no alteration in that state of things till the year 1858, when the powers of the General Board of Health expired, and they were transferred to the Home Secretary. After 1858 there were two other Acts—one in 1861 and the other in 1863. They were amending Acts, into the details of which it was not necessary for him to enter. In 1865 an Act passed entitled the Sewage Utilization Act, the object of which was to enable the local authorities of any district to dispose of sewage so as that it might not become a nuisance, and also apply it to agricultural purposes. It also extended the Health of Towns Act to rural districts. In 1867 there was another Utilization of Sewage Act, which gave further powers to local bodies and enabled them to combine. He might mention that, in 1855, a Sanitary Act dealing with noxious trades was passed, and was amended by the Acts of 1860 and 1863, which were merely amending Acts. He now came to the Act passed in 1866—the Sanitary Act—which was an important one, and deserved rather more attention. It amended the Utilization of Sewage Act of 1865, and gave power to sewage authorities and vestries to form themselves into drainage districts and to enter into undertakings for the better supply of water; it amended the Nuisance Removal Act of 1855, and conferred additional powers in respect of disinfection. A very important provision was that contained in the 49th clause, which gave power to the Home Secretary to execute certain works in default of their being executed by the local authority, and to charge the local authority with the cost. In 1869 and 1870 further Acts were passed relating to sanitary subjects; and at this moment there were not fewer than 15 Acts embodying the provisions to which he had alluded. With the progress of sanitary legislation and the enlargement of the powers of the authorities to whom the carrying out of that legislation had been entrusted, a certain amount of confusion arose in the reading and the enforcing of the several Acts of Parliament. There were several distinct authorities—namely, the urban authority, the rural authority, and the authority represented by the Boards of Guardians—for dealing with the same matters and sometimes with different powers. In some districts the Boards of Guardians were the authority for the removal of nuisances, and the vestries for sewers and the supply of water. With a view to bringing about a better system his right hon. Friend the present Prime Minister, when before in office, advised the Queen to issue a Royal Commission, and the members of that Commission—a very strong one—were subsequently named by the Government of the Party opposite. At the end of three years the Commission made its Report, in which it stated—

“That it is desirable to make laws concerning public health as simple and uniform as possible, and with a view thereto to repeal as far as may be practicable the existing General Acts, and to make amended and more extensive provision in respect of the subject-matter by one comprehensive statute.”

In 1872 an amending Act was passed which divided the authorities into two classes—the urban authority and the rural authority. In 1874 another amending Act was passed; but the law being still in an unsatisfactory state, Her Majesty's Government thought it their duty to bring in this Bill for the purpose of consolidating the various Acts in one Bill. The difficulty of consolidating several Acts was shown by the course pursued in reference to the Navy Discipline Act. The way that was accomplished was this—In 1860 an Act was passed repealing the whole or part of eight Acts, and embodying in one statute the law relating to discipline in the Navy. Then that was repealed and re-enacted with Amendments in 1861. In 1864 the Act of 1861 was repealed and re-enacted with Amendments. In 1866 the process was repeated, and the Act passed in that year formed the code of settled law relating to the discipline in the Navy, and which he believed was found to be satisfactory. The Bill now before their Lordships' House was divided into eleven Parts, but there were only about six of these to which he need call particular attention. Commencing with the third Part, its subject was SANITARY PROVISIONS, and related to the subjects of Sewerage and Drainage, and contained clauses relating to scavenging and cleansing, water supply, cellar-dwellings and lodging-houses, nuisances, offensive trades, unsound meat, infectious diseases and hospitals, the prevention of epidemic diseases, and mortuaries. Part IV., LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONS, related to the subjects of Highways and Streets, and the clauses dealt with the regulation and lighting of streets, new buildings, public pleasure gardens, markets, slaughter-houses, public halls, &c., and police regulations. Part V. contained GENERAL PROVISIONS as to contracts, purchase of land, by-laws, officers, and mode of conducting business by local authorities. Part VI., RATING AND BORROWING POWERS, related to expenses of Urban Authority and Urban Rates, expenses of Rural Authority, borrowing powers and audit. Part VII. to LEGAL PROCEEDINGS; and Part VIII. to ALTERATION OF AREAS AND UNION OF DISTRICTS for constituting the sanitary authority. These were the salient points of the Bill. What he wished more particularly to call attention to, however, were the new provisions which had been introduced and which had hitherto not formed part of the legislation of the country. Under these provisions the local authority had the control of sewers as well without as within their district, and were empowered to carry water mains beyond their district underground. This power did exist at present in regard to sewage, and it seemed only reasonable that it should exist in regard to water, which was equally necessary to the health of the community. Further, the waterworks clauses were incorporated in the Bill in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee. Another clause increased the limit of the cost of the water supply to 2*d.* per week on houses where it could not be provided at a cheaper rate. Then power was granted to local authorities to suppress trade nuisances; to urban authorities to purchase or provide gasworks by agreement; to sanitary authorities generally to proceed against joint contributors to a nuisance; and to the Local Government Board to unite districts and appoint medical officers of health. The provision as to joint contributors to nuisances was framed because it was sometimes difficult to distinguish who the offending party really was, as his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) had found in regard to the pollution of rivers. As for the Amendments made in the other House, they did not call for special notice. They were important, no doubt, but it would be better to consider them in Committee. As to the Bill generally, he ventured to suggest to their Lordships the advisability of confining discussion, as far as possible, to the new provisions; because if they travelled over the whole 341 clauses, re-considering the merits of Acts of Parliament which had been passed during the last 30 years, they would be occupied—he would not say uselessly, but certainly for a much longer period than he could hope would be given to the Bill. If the Bill passed into law in its present state it would present no bar to future improvements in sanitary legislation—on the contrary, it would smooth the way. As for the new provisions introduced, they had been found absolutely necessary in order to reconcile the conflicting provisions of the various Acts dealt with. For instance, under the Public Health Act of 1848, in the case of the junction of a drain with the sewer of the local authority, the written consent of the urban authority was necessary; whereas under the Sanitary Act of 1866, which was equally in force, it was not required. In these observations he believed he had indicated the full scope of the Bill. He might again say, in conclusion, that he did not bring it forward as a great measure of sanitary reform, but as a measure which, by consolidating, with some not unimportant amendments, the Sanitary Acts of the last 30 years, laid a good foundation for such enactments as might in future be deemed necessary for the promotion and maintenance of public health.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord President.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that this Bill, like a great many others, was a Bill to increase the public burdens on the ratepayers. He thought it was high time the ratepayers should have greater control over the local expenditure of the country, but the effect of the present Bill would be to render such control more difficult to exercise than ever. That was not his own opinion alone; it was the opinion of the Officers of Public Health and of the Poor Law Board also. An indispensable condition of good administration was that they should have administrative areas. Now, the present Bill tended to strengthen the unions by making them great borrowing corporations, and therefore much more difficult to arrange in administrative areas; and, as the counties and the unions were not continuous, how could a system of county administration be introduced? Until the boundaries of counties and unions were made to harmonize, it was impossible that any effective system of local administration could exist. His own union extended into three counties, and it was obvious that in such a case the ratepayers of the several counties would have great difficulty in controlling local expenditure. If once, he maintained, the union were made the unit, it would be impossible to get back to the county without great difficulty. When, he might add, the noble Duke who had just spoken (the Duke of Richmond) was down at Brighton the other day he made a very eloquent speech, in which he pointed out, with a good deal of truth, that the predecessors of the present Government in office had passed several measures which had the effect of harassing the country considerably. He was afraid, however, that the noble Duke himself and his Colleagues were following in the same path. They had, for instance, introduced an Artizans Dwellings Bill, which would interfere with the poor very much, unless it was carried out with great caution. There was besides the Agricultural Holdings Bill, with its "letting value," which seemed to have harassed the country so much that there were representations with regard to it from all quarters—although he had been told that he knew nothing about the matter when he warned the Government that they would hear more on the subject. The Pollution of Rivers Bill was another measure which appeared to have so discomposed the various interests which would be effected by it, that the noble Marquess who had charge of it had ever since the second reading been beset with deputations complaining of its provisions. The Bill under discussion was somewhat of a similar character, and was so full of details that it was impossible to enter into them at any length on that occasion. Inspectors and surveyors were to be appointed under its provisions, who would in all probability be frequently very ignorant people, and yet it would be in the power of one of those inspectors to go to a poor man and say—"You must not have this pigsty," and cause a great deal of trouble by insisting on its removal. It would be necessary to examine these inspectors and surveyors before they were appointed, because the authority with which they would be invested was very great; and it seemed to be forgotten that, in passing Provisional Orders, very important measures were often agreed to—not always with due consideration. For these reasons he was of opinion that whenever the Bill went into Committee, it would be necessary to look very carefully into its provisions.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it was not unusual to designate some measures which were brought before Parliament—especially at the end of the Session, and which dealt with a great many matters—"omnibus" Bills. Now, that epithet might, he thought, very well be applied to the speech to which the House had just listened;—or perhaps it might, taking into account the nature of the Bill under discussion, be more appropriately termed a consolidated Opposition speech. The noble Duke had referred to a great number of questions—and had mentioned several Bills which were connected together in no other way except by the fact that they were not in the Bill now before their Lordships. The noble Duke had condemned very seriously too the power of borrowing, and the effect which such a power was likely to have on the re-distribution of administrative power; but, then, there was no power of borrowing contained in the Bill. The same remark applied to several other observations of the noble Duke. He was, however, perfectly willing to concede to him that inspectors were not always infallible, and that it was possible they might sometimes take an undue antipathy to an innocent pigsty; but then it should be borne in mind that inspectors were the genuine outcome of our democratic form of Government; and if, as the noble Duke had recommended, there were to be an examination in discretion in their case, he was afraid that if they were to be intrusted with the larger task of governing our counties a still more strict examination would be required. But if, as the noble Duke argued, inspectors were sometimes careless in the exercise of their power, they could at least, it seemed, plead as an excuse the want of attention on the part of Members of Parliament themselves in dealing with that very important class of legislation known as Provisional Orders. He was, however, afraid he should take up too much of the time of the House if he were to defend the various positions which the noble Duke had selected for attack—he thought they would be best met when the Bills to which they referred were brought under the consideration of their Lordships. He ventured, however, to tender a respectful protest against one particular criticism of the noble Duke. He understood his argument to be that this Bill ought not to pass because the Government had not elaborated some grander scheme with which when produced the smaller provisions of the measure might be found to conflict. Now such a course as that, if adopted, would put a stop to any ameliorative legislation; but in the case of such legislation as that under discussion, hampered as it was in the other House of Parliament and oppressed by the weight of public business constantly increasing, while at the same time the opportunities of carrying it out did not increase, to set our face against minute improvements would be practically to refuse to make any change for the better at all.

LORD ABERDARE pointed out that the question to be determined was at what period consolidation should take place. It was true the late Government were willing to undertake the task of consolidating the various Acts relating to the public health, but they were of opinion that very important amendments of the law should first be made. The difficulties connected with the matter were found to be immense. It was thought by both sides that it would be better to refer it to a Select Committee; but their Report did not much facilitate the action of the Government. There were parts of the existing law which required amendment in order to strengthen the hands of the Local Government Board in the event of the local authorities failing to do their duty. He intended to place on the Paper an Amendment for that purpose, so that the noble Duke opposite might have an opportunity of considering it.

LORD REDESDALE said, that nobody could be more conversant than he was with the mischief which had arisen from the multitude of Acts which had been passed on this subject, and from the difficulty of understanding what the law was in relation to it. He would only say a word of caution—they ought not to be content with looking to those parts of the Bill which merely restored the old Acts. There ought to be some control over the execution of works by local bodies. For example, if a reservoir for supplying water were not properly made, there was a danger of its bursting and doing great injury. In cases of that kind there ought to be some control exercised for the sake of the public safety. The powers given by the Bill to take over waterworks and gasworks from companies also required guarding, in order that the shareholders might have sufficient notice of so important a matter as a proposal to part with their interest in such undertakings. On that and other points some amendments might be made in certain provisions of the existing law with great advantage while they were dealing with that subject. As to making unions conterminous with counties, it was impracticable, except at an enormous amount of expense and trouble, which would be attended with no commensurate benefit to the public. He regarded that Bill as a very important step in the right direction. The repeal of nearly the whole of some 25 Acts was in itself a matter of very great importance, and he trusted that the measure, when amended in some particulars, would be of great advantage to local government throughout the country.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that having frequently complained of the multitude of statutory enactments on that subject, he felt bound in consistency to thank the Government for the very useful measure they had brought in. No one who had not been practically engaged in the work of endeavouring to effect sanitary improvements under the existing law could adequately appreciate the enormous amount of labour, difficulty, and doubt, together with consequent expense, arising from the multiplicity of enactments—sometimes varying and sometimes actually conflicting with each other—which now encumbered the Statute Book in reference to such subjects. Another difficulty of the existing state of things arose from the perplexing manner in which jurisdictions and areas intersected one another.

ARTILLERY, ENGINEER, AND MILITIA OFFICERS.—QUESTIONS.

LORD WAVENEY asked the Under Secretary of State for War, (1.) Whether it is proposed in the case of officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers to revert to the practice of the Militia service in accordance with Her Majesty's Regulations by which adjutants of the Militia service are required to wear the uniform of their respective corps; (2.) whether any instructions have been issued or whether it is proposed to issue any instructions to officers inspecting Militia brigades or regiments to report upon—1. The recruiting of the regiments inspected as to numbers; 2, the quality of recruits obtained; 3, the physical and military efficiency of the Militia soldiers enrolled in the Militia Reserve. (3.) whether it is proposed to attach brigades or regiments of Militia to the forces to be employed in the Autumn Manœuvres of this year?

EARL CADOGAN, in answer to the noble Lord's Questions, said, it was not proposed to alter the regulations as to the uniform to be worn by Adjutants of Militia regiments. He understood the noble Lord to object that the present distinction was hurtful to the feelings of Militia officers; but, on the other hand, it was considered to be of the utmost importance, with a view to the efficiency of Militia regiments, that candidates for those appointments from the Artillery and Engineers should be as numerous as possible. The inducements at present held out being very small, the applications were in consequence very few; and it was believed if those regulations were cancelled there would be still less inducement to officers of the Artillery and Engineers to apply for those appointments. It that were so, the interests of the Militia would be still more injuriously affected than they could possibly be by the distinction in dress. As to the second Question—whether Inspecting Officers had been instructed to report as to the number and quality of recruits of Militia Regiments—Inspecting Officers had been instructed to ask commanding officers of Militia Regiments how many recruits had been enrolled and approved between the termination of the last drilling and the commencement of the preliminary drill, and how many during the preliminary drill. They had also been directed to inquire as to the age, height, and general quality of recruits, and, further, as to how many men had volunteered to join the Militia reserve, and how many men had been approved. With regard to the physical and military efficiency of these Reserves the Inspecting Officers had reported on their general instructions; but there would be no objection to issuing an Instruction in future, with the view of obtaining the information which the noble Lord desired. It was not proposed to attach brigade or regiments of Militia to the forces to be employed in the Autumn Manœuvres this year.

LORD WAVENEY expressed his regret at the reply of the noble Earl, and intimated his attention of bringing the matter under the notice of the House on some future occasion.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

Earl Cadogan

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

AFFAIRS OF GREECE.—QUESTION.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Foreign Office has been called to certain disquieting statements in the public press as to the political condition of the Kingdom of Greece, and whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to communicate to Parliament any official information on the subject?

MR. BOURKE: No, Sir. Her Majesty's Government have no reason to think that there is anything abnormal or exceptional in the present condition of Greece. There has been a change of Government and a Dissolution. Her Majesty's Government do not see any reason to communicate to the House official information on the subject.

IRELAND—REGISTRY OF DEEDS.

QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state whether it is intended to give effect from its original date to the Treasury Minute of June 12th, 1874, "Regulating the Salaries in the Office of the Registrar of Deeds in Ireland;" and, whether promotions are to be made in that office as recommended by the registrar?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, it was intended to give effect to the Treasury Minute as from the 1st April, 1874; and the recommendations of the Registrar with regard to promotion were now under the consideration of the Treasury.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1871— SCHOOLS IN THE FEN DISTRICTS.

QUESTION.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the difficulties in the way of the formation of school districts in the fens surrounding Boston have been surmounted, and if so, how soon the first notices of his Department with respect to those districts are likely to be issued?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the difficulties in the way of the formation of school districts in the fens surrounding Boston are greater, as my hon. Friend is aware, than, I believe, in any other part of England, and I regret to say that though every endeavour is being made to expedite their formation, we have not yet seen our way to a satisfactory mode of treating them. We have some hope that, if a Bill brought in by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, for making better provision for the arrangement of divided parishes and for other purposes, becomes law, we may possibly be assisted by it respecting these fen districts. In the meantime, if my hon. Friend will favour us by calling at the Education Office, we shall be glad to have the aid of his local knowledge.

PUBLIC BILLS—LORDS AMENDMENTS TO COMMONS BILLS.—QUESTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GOLDSMID: I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, a question of Order in consequence of an occurrence which took place in the House on Friday night at a very late period of the evening. Doubtless, Sir, you will remember that three Members of Her Majesty's Government—namely, the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Selater-Booth), and the hon. Gentleman the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), one after the other, when the list of Bills upon the Paper had been exhausted, got up and asked the House to consider Amendments which had been made in the House of Lords to Bills under their charge, but not mentioned in the Notices of the House. Now, Sir, as it appears to me that a proceeding like this is calculated to destroy those feelings of confidence which ought to exist between the Government and the House with regard to the business which is likely to be brought before it, as Amendments of very great importance may be passed without anybody happening to know that they were going to be brought on, and as it was only by an accident that my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) and myself were here at that very late hour to object to those Amendments being considered, I venture to ask you, Sir, what is the proper practice with regard to the consideration of Amendments on Bills which have come down from the House of Lords, and whether Notice ought not to be given that those Amendments will be considered by placing a Notice upon the Paper in the same way as has been done to-day with regard to some Bills? I venture to ask the practice of the House in this respect in order that hon. Members may not be taken by surprise.

MR. SPEAKER: The question of the consideration of Lords Amendments is regulated by a Standing Order of the House, which I will read to the House. It is dated July 19, 1854, and is to this effect—

"That Lords Amendments to Public Bills shall be appointed to be considered on a future day, unless the House shall order them to be considered forthwith."

No doubt the usual practice of the House has been to appoint the consideration of Lords Amendments on a future day, but in cases where expedition is necessary, it has been the practice of the House occasionally—especially at a late period of the Session—to order that those Amendments shall be considered forthwith, without notice. But on such occasions the hon. Member in charge of such Bills is bound to satisfy the House that expedition is necessary.

EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN BILL.

[BILL 203.]

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Secretary Cross.)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, who had given Notice of his intention to move the Previous Question, said, it was a subject which did not agitate England alone, but also America and Australia. He did not believe that the Bill would remedy the evils connected with the Labour question. The alterations which it proposed to make in the law were slight and few. With regard to the next Bill on the Paper—namely, the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Bill, he might say that it would make only one amendment in the law, while some other points in the law, and those the worst ones, were allowed to remain. "But," said the Home Secretary, "if you do not accept these proposals we will let the Act of 1867 lapse, and the old laws in the 1st Schedule will come into operation." The right hon. Gentleman would not dare thus to trifle with a question of such magnitude. He wished, however, to give the Home Secretary credit for all the improvements he had proposed. The first improvement which the right hon. Gentleman desired to make was to substitute for two justices of the peace—that was to say, two employers of labour—wherever it was practicable, either a County Court Judge or a stipendiary magistrate; but in the second Bill the two justices were retained, as was also the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the interpretation of which was left to their discretion. The second Amendment was this—Under the Act of 1867 the damages which might be awarded were limited to £20, whilst in the present Bill there was no limit whatever. If the poor man was to be so amerced as was proposed it would ruin him. Practically, the power to deal with the matter was in the hands of the employers, and it might become an instrument of great injustice towards the labouring man. A further limit proposed by the Home Secretary was, that there should be no imprisonment unless the persons affected should fail to pay the penalty; but one was at a loss to know whether the right hon. Gentleman meant failure to pay on account of poverty or on account of neglect. Harsh and tyrannical rules might be posted up at the places of work, and those rules might be held to be part of the contract between the employers and the employed, for against such tyranny the working man had no remedy whatsoever. Such were the Amendments which the Home Secretary proposed to introduce into the Bill. It was a Bill which was to be neither here nor there. It would be a dead letter—it would not be used. And why? Because every employer would be sure to regard a violation of contract or a strike as wilful and malicious, and therefore he would proceed, not under the provisions of this measure, but under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, or 5th clause of the Home Secretary's next Bill, which was, to all intents and purposes, as nearly as possible the same as the 14th clause, so justly objected to by all working men, of the Act of 1867. The principle of the proposals of the Government was based on an utterly false policy and the subject-matter of these Bills had been utterly distorted. The principle of the Bills was the destruction of trades unions, and the subject-matter of them was the relation subsisting between the working men and the employers. In the latter the right hon. Gentleman had followed the example set him by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, but in the principle of the Bills he had followed the exact lines of the 4th clause of the Trades Unions Act of 1871. That was a singular course of action, and the very reverse of the policy which the right hon. Gentleman ought to follow if he wanted to settle this labour question. The right hon. Gentleman indulged in grandiloquent amphibology when he said his object was to secure freedom of contract. The real object of the Government was to stop the legislative, the judicial, and the coercive action of the trades unions. The Home Secretary's plan of freedom and independence was the very contradictory to the existence of those societies. He asserted that the Home Secretary's principle was the compulsory reduction of wages, and he believed the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly aware that this was so. The right hon. Gentleman went into a long history of the laws which he supposed to exist in former times for the reduction of wages, because he knew that the destruction of trades unions was tantamount to the reduction of wages. Trades unions were invented for the very purpose of preventing wages from being borne down by the competition of workmen, which the plan of the Government encouraged, and that could only be done by each workman giving up his individual will for the will of the whole body. That principle was right, and he (Lord Robert Montagu) maintained that free competition ought not to be secured in the case of working men. The Commissioners said on this subject that the object of the law should be equally to secure freedom of action, and that cloven foot it was that appeared to have so much captivated the Home Secretary; but the right hon. Gentleman forgot that the working man was placed in such a position as to leave him no alternative but to accept the terms that were offered to him or starve, while a master could cease operations for years, living in the meantime upon his capital. Free competition would bear wages down to so low a point that a man could not properly support his wife and children. Therefore, bearing down wages to the lowest point would be offering a premium to men not to marry at all, or at least not to have any family. The result would be to encourage working men who were unmarried or who neglected their duty to their children. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members of that House, never having felt want themselves, had ever disregarded the interests of working men. ["No, no!"] That House never had regarded the interests of working men—["Oh, oh!"]—and it was well that some at least should speak in their favour. It was precisely the feeling of the Tory Party that no one should speak in favour of the working man. By natural law every man had a right to combine, and by taking from trade associations the executive power of punishing their members, you were not making working men free and independent; you were making them stand alone and were forcing them to accept lower wages. In that way poverty would come to working men, whose trades unions were their support against capitalists. It might be asked—was this right of combination a benefit to the State? He would answer this question by asking another—was it not better for men to associate together than to be isolated and in antagonism? In his opinion trades unions were not only a natural right, but a preservative of order. If they had not that power of combination working men would feel, as they did at the outset of the French Revolution, that there was no salvation for them but by appealing to their numbers and to force, and then they would seek to overthrow capital altogether. It was said that working men ought to be freed from the tyranny of trades unions. But that alleged "tyranny" was only the exercise of the proper legislative power which every society and every club possessed of making its own laws and regulations. Was it the small minority or the majority who suffered from this tyranny? If the small minority, it was their fault that they so suffered; if it was the majority, they had in their own hands the power of freeing themselves. But they did not desire such "freedom," and supported trades unions because they knew that only by such means could they cope with capital. Parliament had done everything it could do by legislation to break up and destroy trades unions. What was the result? These unions had increased and multiplied. Their numbers and their influence had grown considerably, and the wish and object of Parliament, not a friendly one—namely, the desire to make working men knuckle down to employers—had been defeated. So much for the principle of the Bill. Now for its subject-matter. It appeared that the contracts of the manual labour class were not to be treated like the contracts of other persons. The proposals of the Government did not apply to shopmen, clerks, Post Office officials, or policemen, who were left to the Common Law; but if working men on strike pointed out to others that their continuance at work would injure themselves in the end, and that they would lose the advantages of the union, they might be punished, though that was only fair argument, and would not be reached by the ordinary law. A recent Charge of the right hon. and learned Recorder had brought home this question—"Why should men of the manual labour class be punished for doing that which was not punishable by the ordinary law?" Working men had said in that case—"If you do so-and-so you will be looked upon as a black sheep." Hereupon they were charged with conspiring to molest and obstruct. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said both parties were acting within their rights; there would be no evidence to support an indictment at Common Law. But though there was no criminal act those men were sent to gaol. What were working men to think of that when the Judge said they were within their rights? ["No, no!"] Why, the Judge had said so. If working men were to watch at the gate of an employer to induce him to send away a particular man, or to cease the use of a poisonous dye which he employed in his business, it would be indictable under the Criminal Law Amendment Act. Again, if one workman hid the saw or hammer of another because he owed him money, he might be indicted under the Criminal Law Amendment Act; and yet Parliament allowed the keeper of a public-house to detain the property of a man who owed him money. The children of Israel complained of the way in which Pharaoh conducted his business, in making them manufacture bricks without straw, and under that Bill the Home Secretary would have sent them all to prison. It was stated at a deputation that waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London in 1873 that in Yorkshire when a man left his work the employers would not enable him to work in any shop in the district for the next six months. They combined together to coerce him and starve him for six months, and for that they were not liable to punishment; but if workmen combined together to better their circumstances they were to be punished for conspiracy. In short, our Criminal Law Amendment Act did not reach the masters, but it pressed on the workmen with fearful violence. Both rattening and picketing were forbidden by the Act. But "rattening" was nothing more than a form of distraint upon the goods of a working man by the governing body of his fellow-labourers, while "picketing" was merely a means of giving notice to men in search of work that at the shop thus attended the accustomed workmen were on strike, and that anyone accepting work in it would injure themselves in the future by losing certain privileges in connection with trades unionism to which they would otherwise be entitled. That kind of thing existed in every society, and yet Parliament did not interfere. In that House, if the Speaker were told not to call on some particular man because he was not subservient to his Party, and the reporters were told not to report him, and in the morning there was not a line of his speech in the papers, would not that be depriving a person of his tools?—so that what was done for the working man was absurd when it was applied to themselves. They had in that House "Whips" and "Finders." The Finders went about the Lobby, and ascertained how a Member was going to vote, and the Whip stood at the door and told him how his Party was going to vote; and was not that picketing in another form? There was nothing criminal in the act; but if one working man told another working man not to work for a certain master because of a strike, he was punished; but what more wrong was it in that case than the Whip standing at the door and telling a Member how to vote? There were two principles in the Bill. The first was, that in the case of manual labour to break a contract was a crime, and to agree to do so was a conspiracy. But to break a civil contract was a civil act, and we had no right to inquire into the intention. In the case of a minute contract, a man at the pumping engine of a mine might walk away without notice, immense damage might be done to property, and yet the act would not be a criminal one. But if there was a contract for a week, the man who should do the same act would commit a crime, and to agree to do so would be conspiracy. They were confusing civil and criminal acts and going beyond the ordinary law whenever they dealt with working men. This Bill would also alter the relations between employer and workman. What in a great many trades would be a simple breach of agreement would in another become a crime.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS begged the noble Lord's pardon—the act in such a case must be "wilfully and maliciously" done.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU would acknowledge he had made a little mistake there. Wherever there was a general danger to the State or a large body of the community ensuing from the neglect to perform a contract, that neglect was to be considered a crime. Such a principle could not be defended on any ground whatever. If there was a strike among the coal owners, and no coal reached the gas works, no gas could be made; but its absence would be considered no crime on the part of the gas company, although the public would suffer precisely the same danger and inconvenience as if the want of gas had been occasioned by neglect of the workmen, whose neglect would be treated as a crime. If public danger and inconvenience were enough to constitute neglect a crime in one case, why not in every case?—and if not in every case, why in any? So with regard to water. If a water company did not filter the water they supplied to the public, would no danger and inconvenience be incurred by the community? Would there be less danger and inconvenience in such a case than if a working man walked away when the water was not turned on? But in the latter case the neglect was treated as a crime, while the rich companies were let off. Such a distinction was utterly false and fallacious, and could not be carried out. An act might be apparently wilful and malicious which was not really so, and the greatest injustice and oppression must result from an attempt to enforce such a measure. The ambiguity implied in the words “wilfully and maliciously” would not alter the relations between workman and employer. Breach of contract being a civil wrong, no person had a right to inquire whether it was wilful and malicious or not. It was not a criminal, but a civil act. The relations subsisted between the workman and the employer, and not between the workman and the outside public; and Parliament had no right to step in and say that an inconvenience to a third party, arising from a breach of contract between employer and workman, should be amenable to punishment. The effect would be to induce working men to get rid of all contracts, and have only minute contracts. In connection with the point, let them remember there was not more than a day’s consumption of edibles in London. The locomotive engine-drivers all made minute contracts. They could leave at any time, and produce danger and inconvenience to the public, and yet they would be exempt from the operation of this Bill, and the effect of its provisions would be to increase that system. It was adopted at present by miners, ironworkers, engineers, and the building trade—which included joiners, masons, carpenters, plumbers, and plasterers—and ship-builders, and in the Nottingham textile trades when a man finished his warp. It would be to the advantage of the State to have long and, if possible, permanent contracts, so that we might not have a nomad population. He objected entirely to the principle of the Bill, but he would not move the Previous Question, as he believed there was a disposition on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to give way to the wishes of the working men; but on the second Bill he believed it would be necessary to divide the House.

MR. LOWE said, it had sometimes been the duty of himself and of hon. Members on his side of the House—at least they had thought it so—to complain of Bills introduced by the Government, because they were wanting in vigour and stringency, but no complaint of that kind could fairly be urged with regard to this Bill. As one who had given a great deal of attention to the subject, he must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as having, in the measure he had introduced, emancipated his mind boldly and freely from a mass of prejudice in relation to it. He had emancipated his mind fairly and boldly from a mass of prejudice—he had laid down proper principles and applied them properly; and he would have the satisfaction of introducing a measure which would do great good by soothing passions and conciliating those who believed they had conflicting interests. Therefore, he did not rise to imitate the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu), but to give his humble assent to the general principle of the Bill, in the hope that in some degree it might tend to console the Home Secretary for the awful castigation he had received. The right hon. Gentleman, in his (Mr. Lowe’s) opinion, was entitled to the more credit, because the matter was involved in some perplexity by the Report of the recent Commission, which so far from offering a solution of the questions involved them in further obscurity. However, the right hon. Gentleman had delivered them from the necessity of discovering a solution and had cleared the ground for them, for he had wisely, in regard to the first Bill, seen that the only principle by which these matters could be fairly dealt with was that of contract. To that the right hon. Gentleman had adhered, and he (Mr. Lowe) was convinced that the more the measure was considered the more it would commend itself to the approbation of the House. In the way of suggestion, he would remark that the right hon. Gentleman gave a Court the power of rescinding a contract—a power which, as far as he knew, had never been vested in any Court. He did not see why such a power should be given; and, if it were, it would introduce great confusion and perplexity. The right hon. Gentleman deserved great credit for having exploded altogether the doctrine of the specific performance of the labour contract, which was founded on an entire misapprehension of the practice of the Courts of Equity. If a Court would refuse to order Mr. Kean to act Richard III. continuously, because it would involve a succession of efforts no man could be called upon to make, was it not monstrous that a Court should claim to compel a man to do a particular thing for a year? It would be introducing a principle of slavery utterly inconsistent with the genius of our laws and institutions, and for which no precedent or parallel could be found in the law of England. The right hon. Gentleman, much to his honour, had got rid of that principle and had substituted a principle which was fair in itself—namely, that a person who had rendered himself liable to damages for breach of contract, instead of having to pay them, should be allowed to return to his master's service, giving security that he would perform the remainder of it. It was a fair provision which did credit to the originality of the right hon. Gentleman; but the security ought to be the security of somebody else, in order to satisfy the master that the contract would be observed and induce him to forego his right to have damages. As the Bill was drawn it was also the man himself who would give security. A man could not increase his power of paying compensation by saying that he gave security, when he had no security to give except a personal promise; it did not add to the master's security; and this had occasioned the right hon. Gentleman to do what it was to be hoped he would re-consider—namely, to say that if a man would not, after giving security, return to work he should be imprisoned. That was but restoring imprisonment for debt in another form, and it involved the objectionable principle that a man who was not able to get credit otherwise might get credit by undertaking to submit himself to harsh treatment and conditions. According to Tacitus, it was the practice of the ancient Germans that a gambler who had played away his substance and his wife and children, might at last stake himself, and, if he lost, go into perpetual slavery. We should not think that a right principle in this country, but it was the same as allowing a man to stipulate that he should be imprisoned for debt, under certain circumstances, in order to get credit he could not obtain in any other way. If the right hon. Gentleman would consider this point with the same liberality with which he had dealt with other parts of the subject, he would see that his proposal was well worthy of revision. It would be better to get rid of imprisonment altogether in these measures, and to leave this simply as a matter of debt. He did not object to the introduction of two tribunals—the County Court for sums above £10 and the justices for sums below that amount; but he wished to point out that if an offence was tried before the justices, they would merely have the power of awarding the sum that was due for a man to pay, and if the man could not pay, there was no remedy that he (Mr. Lowe) was aware of that could be taken against him, except that of selling such goods as the man might have. But if he was taken before the County Court the matter was quite different; for there the Judge, by what he (Mr. Lowe) considered a most harsh and cruel law now in force, had the power of ordering the defendant to pay by instalments, and if he made default in any instalment and it could be proved that he had had money in his hands, no matter what other claims he might have had to meet, he was liable, if he did not pay, to be imprisoned; the payment might be divided into seven instalments, and the defendant was liable to be imprisoned upon all of them. After he had been imprisoned upon all of them, imprisonment had not the effect of the old law of cancelling the debt, but the defendant still remained as much liable for the debt as ever. By introducing the machinery of the County Court the right hon. Gentleman had introduced that element into the matter; and he (Mr. Lowe) thought it would be a very great improvement in the Bill if the operation of the law of 1869 were negatived, and he hoped that the time would soon arrive when we should blot it out of the Statute Book altogether. He thought it was very desirable in all these cases to have as little as possible of class legislation, and to make the general law as wide as possible; and he would suggest whether it would not be worth while to extend the principle of the Bill to all persons earning wages, including menial servants, at all events if the parties were willing to go before the justices instead of waiting for the decision of the County Court. As long as we retained a vestige of slavery, and acted on the traditional assumption that every man was to work for somebody at prescribed wages and be punished if he did not, such a claim as he put forward might be unreasonable, but now, that nobody would wish to drag anybody else within such a law, and when we had adopted instead the basis of contract, he could see no reason why a remedy of this kind should not be extended to all persons. As to the second Bill, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had adopted a fair and reasonable principle with regard to the law of conspiracy. The policy of the law, as embodied in the Act of 1871, was to place masters and employed as much as possible on an equality, and if they applied the law of conspiracy stringently to what might be called trades unions, the effect must be to put the employed at a disadvantage, as it would happen that certain things would be lawful to the master merely because he was one, which would be unlawful to the men because they were many. Therefore, the proposal that no men should be punished for conspiracy for any act which was not in itself penal was a wise improvement of the law. He wished to suggest as a principle the making of our legislation as wide and general as possible, and he was disposed to agree in the view of the right hon. Gentleman that some punishment should follow desertions of duty involving serious consequences. It seemed to him that if a man by a wilful breach of duty deprived a town of gas and water or placed human life in danger—conduct which was not punishable at all as far as he was aware—or if he endangered property of considerable value, it was quite right and fair that he should come within the dominion of the law. He submitted, however, that faults of that kind could be committed by other people besides workmen, and that it was not wise to limit the punishment to working people, and thus put a kind of stigma upon them. Supposing, for instance, that a contractor for gas or waterworks the construction of which involved the supply or non-supply of a whole district, or possibly the lives of a number of people, failed from mere negligence to set his men to work, and mischief followed, there was no law to punish him; but if one of his workmen had absconded and damage followed as a consequence, such workman would be liable to heavy punishment. The enactment of laws such as this was not, in his view of the matter, a proper course to be taken in order to weld all classes together, and he felt sure that the right hon. Gentleman had no object except to bring about harmonious action between all classes of persons who were interested in the labour laws. He would, therefore, suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should so modify this particular clause as to provide—such person should be held responsible for his illegal act, no matter whether his position happened to be that of master or of man. If the right hon. Gentleman did that, he would but be making a very reasonable concession to a not unnatural feeling of sensitiveness and jealousy on the part of the working classes, who objected strongly to be made the subjects of special legislation. As he did not wish to trouble the House again on this matter, he would at once lay before the right hon. Gentleman and the House one or two suggestions in reference to the Criminal Law Amendment Act. Among a considerable section of the working classes there was a strong desire to obtain the repeal, if not of the whole Act, at least of what was known as the “picketing clause” of the measure. He was not at all seeking for popularity in

for the debt as ever. By introducing the machinery of the County Court the right hon. Gentleman had introduced that element into the matter; and he (Mr. Lowe) thought it would be a very great improvement in the Bill if the operation of the law of 1869 were negatived, and he hoped that the time would soon arrive when we should blot it out of the Statute Book altogether. He thought it was very desirable in all these cases to have as little as possible of class legislation, and to make the general law as wide as possible; and he would suggest whether it would not be worth while to extend the principle of the Bill to all persons earning wages, including menial servants, at all events if the parties were willing to go before the justices instead of waiting for the decision of the County Court. As long as we retained a vestige of slavery, and acted on the traditional assumption that every man was to work for somebody at prescribed wages and be punished if he did not, such a claim as he put forward might be unreasonable, but now, that nobody would wish to drag anybody else within such a law, and when we had adopted instead the basis of contract, he could see no reason why a remedy of this kind should not be extended to all persons. As to the second Bill, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had adopted a fair and reasonable principle with regard to the law of conspiracy. The policy of the law, as embodied in the Act of 1871, was to place masters and employed as much as possible on an equality, and if they applied the law of conspiracy stringently to what might be called trades unions, the effect must be to put the employed at a disadvantage, as it would happen that certain things would be lawful to the master merely because he was one, which would be unlawful to the men because they were many. Therefore, the proposal that no men should be punished for conspiracy for any act which was not in itself penal was a wise improvement of the law. He wished to suggest as a principle the making of our legislation as wide and general as possible, and he was disposed to agree in the view of the right hon. Gentleman that some punishment should follow desertions of duty involving serious consequences. It seemed to him that if a man by a wilful breach of duty deprived a town of gas and water or placed human life in danger—conduct which was not punishable at all as far as he was aware—or if he endangered property of considerable value, it was quite right and fair that he should come within the dominion of the law. He submitted, however, that faults of that kind could be committed by other people besides workmen, and that it was not wise to limit the punishment to working people, and thus put a kind of stigma upon them. Supposing, for instance, that a contractor for gas or waterworks the construction of which involved the supply or non-supply of a whole district, or possibly the lives of a number of people, failed from mere negligence to set his men to work, and mischief followed, there was no law to punish him; but if one of his workmen had absconded and damage followed as a consequence, such workman would be liable to heavy punishment. The enactment of laws such as this was not, in his view of the matter, a proper course to be taken in order to weld all classes together, and he felt sure that the right hon. Gentleman had no object except to bring about harmonious action between all classes of persons who were interested in the labour laws. He would, therefore, suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should so modify this particular clause as to provide—such person should be held responsible for his illegal act, no matter whether his position happened to be that of master or of man. If the right hon. Gentleman did that, he would but be making a very reasonable concession to a not unnatural feeling of sensitiveness and jealousy on the part of the working classes, who objected strongly to be made the subjects of special legislation. As he did not wish to trouble the House again on this matter, he would at once lay before the right hon. Gentleman and the House one or two suggestions in reference to the Criminal Law Amendment Act. Among a considerable section of the working classes there was a strong desire to obtain the repeal, if not of the whole Act, at least of what was known as the “picketing clause” of the measure. He was not at all seeking for popularity in reference to this matter, and therefore he had no hesitation in saying that he saw no cause for the repeal which was demanded. If the liberty of the subject was to be maintained, it must not be allowed that one set of persons should deliberately destroy any particular man's liberty because he happened to differ from them on particular points. Therefore, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had done right in not touching on this particular matter, but there were one or two suggestions he would like to make on the general question. The first branch of the Act with which he proposed to deal was that which provided punishment for persons who threatened other persons so as to coerce them in reference to their work. For this he saw no necessity in face of the fact that the existing general law gave to magistrates power to deal with all such cases by binding over persons using threats and imprisoning them when they failed to procure sureties for good behaviour. Therefore, as the clause was useless and invidious, he thought it would be but reasonable to expunge it from the Act. The second provision was that which defined the punishment to be inflicted upon persons who, in order to prevent other persons following their employment, used violence either to person or property. He could not imagine why such a provision was foisted into the measure, for it was fully provided for under the general law of the country, and ought not to be made a part of any special legislation. So with regard also to the clauses relating to rattening and other matters of that kind, he thought that those offences were of a general nature, and need not be confined to trades unionists offences. The House would remember the case of a man who, some years ago, persistently followed about a lady whom many hon. Members knew personally and all respected, in order to force her into a most unequal and improper marriage. There was no law to punish that man, and he persecuted the lady with impunity. He thought it would be perfectly easy to draw a clause which would have the whole effect of the third part of the 1st section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act—a clause which would entirely cover all the ground now covered and a good deal of what was not covered, and which would prevent a good deal of annoyance; and though it would not be acceptable to many of the working classes, he thought it would be accepted as a proof that Parliament was anxious as far as it could to meet their wishes and to conciliate their feelings, and it might have some effect in toning down any acerbity which now existed. They all wished to restore harmony and unity among all classes. The country had every reason to be proud of its manufacturers and also of its workmen. There would always arise differences as to the proportions in which profits arising from manufactures should be divided between capital and labour. These questions could not be settled by legislative enactments, and all that Parliament was called upon to do was to conciliate all classes as far as possible, and settle the basis on which they could work together for the common good. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had taken a step in the right direction, and therefore he had been emboldened to make a few suggestions on the subject. He had placed a few Amendments on the Paper; but if he found that the passing of the measure would be risked by his pressing them, he should not trouble the House by bringing his proposals forward.

LORD ELCHO said, the praise which had just been bestowed upon the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman must have consoled his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for the speech of his noble Friend the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) who had given Notice of an Amendment. His noble Friend said the Home Secretary had been captivated by a cloven foot—whatever that phrase in its present connection might mean. He also said that the principle of freedom upon which the Bill was based was the opposite of what the principle of legislation of this kind should be. It was impossible for him (Lord Elcho) to gauge what his noble Friend's knowledge of the working classes might be, but having had much experience of them in connection with the Act of 1867, he (Lord Elcho) ventured to say that the great mass of them no more believed in the infallibility of trades unions than they did in the infallibility of the Pope. The noble Lord, commencing with the Act of 1867, condemned the legislation of all succeeding Parliaments down to the present, who had attempted to deal with this labour question, and, in fact, throughout his speech had constituted himself the mouthpiece of the extreme party of trade unionists, and in several cases had repeated the exact words spoken by the chairman of the Trades Union Congress at Sheffield in 1873, and since then by the chairmen of demonstrations in Hyde Park and elsewhere. He (Lord Elcho), however, felt sure that his hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) would substantiate him in saying that the Bill at the time of its passing gave satisfaction to the principal representatives of the working classes in this country. Having been to some extent responsible for the Act of 1867, he would give them a brief history of that legislation. A Committee was moved for, and after sitting for two years, and taking evidence of working men, a Report was drawn up. The Committee sat at Glasgow, and, after the whole matter had been long considered by employers and employed, the Act of 1867 was introduced, and was looked upon by the country at large as satisfactory. The Times newspaper, in remarking on it, said that it crowned a long series of remedial legislation, that it removed the last rag of inequality, and that the employers and employed now stood face to face on equal terms. The present Prime Minister, moreover, in his speech at Edinburgh, cited it as an instance of legislation intended to meet the views of working men. There were two principles contained in that Act, one making a civil offence that which had previously been criminal, and the other establishing equality between working men and their employers. In the belief of the working men both those results had been obtained by the Act, and the Glasgow Committee declared that it had placed employers and workmen on a level platform. If, however, it were found that having regard to the principles intended to be embodied in his measure, it had either been defectively drawn or defectively administered, that would not affect the original intentions of its promoters, who endeavoured to give a fair and proper application to those principles. His hon. Friend the Member for Stafford before the Trades Union Commission, of which he (Lord Elcho) was a Member, gave the strongest evidence as to the intention of Parliament in passing the Act in question, and stated that although the House of Commons contained many capitalists it was willing to do justice to the workmen when they were aggrieved. He would conclude by saying that it appeared to him that the Government was now acting rightly in putting master and servant upon an equality before the law, and in carrying out absolute freedom not only between master and servant, but between workman and workman. He did not deny that trades unions had in one way and another done a great deal of good; but as only one man out of every 14 or 15 was connected with them, one thing was absolutely necessary—namely, to secure the absolute freedom of individuals, and not to allow any one class or any individuals of any class to interfere with the freedom of others.

MR. MACDONALD said, that he did not agree with the statement of the noble Lord who had spoken first in this debate (Lord Robert Montagu), that it was the object of the Home Secretary in this and the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Bill to destroy trades unionism. He felt perfectly confident that the right hon. Gentleman had too good a knowledge of these institutions, and that he was desirous of giving fair play to the working man; and he believed the right hon. Gentleman had not in the remotest corner of his mind any intention of interfering with trades unions—he was equally sure the Government collectively had no such intention, because they would not dare in the present state of things to interfere with them. The noble Lord had told them that the laws which were framed up to 1871 were inimical to trades unions and the interests of the working men. Well, he must say the noble Lord, in his zeal for the working men, had not read the history of this country as he (Mr. Macdonald) had done it. He felt confident that in no other country in the world had such legislation been carried out as the Imperial Parliament had enacted for the protection of young women and children, for the protection of life and limb, and for the protection of working men in every respect. Therefore, while he was strongly in favour of amending the existing law, he would be no party to declaiming against those remedial measures which Parliament had passed even before the adoption of the extended suffrage and the Ballot. So far back as 1859 a small

Bill was introduced, and he was one of the parties who tried to get that measure passed into law. It was passed, and it had for its object to enable working men to speak to each other, and to persuade each other, if they so thought fit, to join in combination. That Bill, although simple in its character, had a most beneficial effect upon the state of things which had existed up to that time. He now came to the question which immediately concerned the House to-night. In the first place, he felt bound to thank the Home Secretary for introducing these Bills, and he might tell him that within the last few days the trades unions of Manchester, the working men of Sheffield, and the Parliamentary Committee which represented the trades unionists of the United Kingdom, had all given a general though qualified support to the Bill. On Thursday he had the honour of presenting a deputation to the Home Office, representing 750,000 men, who expressed unqualified satisfaction with these two Bills, except with regard to some trifling Amendments. Glasgow had also spoken out, and, so far as he was aware, the city of Edinburgh only had pronounced against these measures, and the right hon. Gentleman might feel gratified with the reception which they had met. He (Mr. Macdonald) hoped that the powerful Party which was sitting behind him, as well as many Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, would endeavour to aid him in passing these Bills, and settle as far as they could the difference between employers and workmen. With regard to the Master and Servant Act, to which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho) referred, it was thought at the time that it would establish perfect equality between masters and workmen, but it was soon discovered that it would not accomplish that object, however good the noble Lord's intention had been, and however good the intention of that House had been. Three most objectionable provisions were discovered in the measure introduced by the noble Lord opposite shortly after it became law. By those provisions matters that ought to be dealt with by the civil law were made subject to the criminal law. It was proved that the Judge had power to order the fulfilment of a contract, and that if that order were not complied with he could punish by imprisonment. It was also discovered that that Act for the first time introduced the monstrous principle that a Judge should declare what was an "aggravated offence," or, in other words, should create the offence. And the Judge having declared what constituted an "aggravated offence" might pass a sentence of three months' imprisonment with hard labour upon the accused. The working men had to congratulate themselves that a measure to remedy the objections to that Act had been introduced by a Conservative statesman who he (Mr. Macdonald) believed was desirous that justice should be done between employer and employed. He was of opinion that there was no necessity for penalties for breaches of contract—the system of "minute contract" which had been adopted in many of the largest manufacturing establishments in this country with great advantage to all the parties concerned proved this. He hoped the time would come when in all our large industrial establishments work would be carried on on that condition. Under a minute contract an incompetent or vicious workman could be immediately got rid of, instead of being able to continue in an establishment for some weeks or months to the annoyance of his employer. A minute contract would also, on the other hand, enable a workman instantly to leave the employment of an unjust master. The minute contract produced perfect respect in both parties, and put them both in a position of perfect independence. The employer refrained from doing wrong to his workman, because he knew that the man might leave him at any moment; and, on the other hand, the working man refrained from doing wrong to his master, because he knew that he could get rid of him at any moment. There was another point in reference to the breaking of contracts. There was an impression abroad that trades unions employed their agency and influence in the breaking of contracts. Now, he ventured to affirm that they were not contract breakers; nay, more, he would venture to affirm that not 5 per cent of the parties brought up for breach of contract belonged to trades unions. If a wrong was inflicted upon a member of a trades union by his master, the man did not break his contract; he merely sought the advice of his society, who often dissuaded him from taking that step. He agreed with what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London had said, and hoped the Home Secretary would receive his suggestions in a generous spirit. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had not dealt with the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and trusted he would yet deal with it in such a way as to prevent the recurrence of such an event as that which they had recently witnessed in the case of the cabinet makers. He hoped, if the right hon. Gentleman could not see his way to doing something in the matter during the present Session, he would do so early next year. A number of the offences mentioned in that Act were offences which ought justly to be punished, but he was of opinion that they ought to be relegated to the Common Law. It might be said this was a sentimental grievance—he was quite sure it was not right that these class distinctions should be preserved, and when the time came for the Home Secretary to deal with the subject, he hoped he would do so against the employers as well as working men. As the law at present stood an employer, or an association of employers, could do all the things which were contemplated by the Act, and yet get off scatheless. What was the intention of picketing? It was to keep men from going to a certain place to work. The workmen had the right to persuade their fellow-workmen not to go to work. That was legal picketing. But the employer could picket and do what the employed could not do, for he could picket so as to prevent men from working, and that was done almost every day. He could do the same with respect to rattening, and the law did not touch him. The fact was that the employer could do everything which was mentioned in the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and yet he committed no breach of the law. He had in his possession numberless documents showing that when men had struck, their employers wrote to other people and told them to give the men no work. One of the latest instances of this kind was the action of the tinplate manufacturers at Swansea. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman in dealing with the question would make the law so strong that neither the employer nor the employed would be able to prevent men from following their lawful calling, and would place both parties on an equal footing. In conclusion, he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for bringing in these Bills, and hoped that he would have the consolidated support of his Party in passing them with such Amendments as would make them just and equitable. By doing so the right hon. Gentleman would have the credit of doing successfully what the feeble hands of a Bruce dare not touch or the jaunty mind of a Sir George Grey could not comprehend—he would make himself popular with the whole working classes generally.

MR. TENNANT, as a manufacturer and employer of labour, desired to express his unqualified approval of the principle of the two measures, and rejoiced to find that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), who might be said to represent the working classes, was also satisfied with the proposals of the Government. It was evident that the opinions expressed by the noble Lord below the gangway (Lord Robert Montagu) were repudiated by those who represented the working classes. He had great pleasure, therefore, in thanking his right hon. Friend for introducing the Bills, and although it might be said that they went far beyond what the Commissioners recommended in their Report, yet it was impossible for a Government framing measures on these subjects to carry out some of the suggestions which were recommended, for they were quite irreconcilable with the data on which they were founded, and inconsistent with the principles which the Commissioners themselves laid down. The principles introduced in the Bill were plain and intelligible. The first was to make the relationship between the employers and employed entirely in the nature of a civil contract, and to divest it of all character of criminality. This was the principle embodied in the Employers and Workmen Act. The other principle laid down by the Commissioners was that no act which in itself was innocent and legal when performed by a single individual should be transformed into an illegal and criminal act when it was performed by two or more persons. Those were principles which, in his opinion, could not be controverted. The absence of any power to enforce the performance of a specific contract had been complained of, but it was in the very nature of a contract of personal deplore the quarrels which arose from time to time between masters and workmen, and if we could only bring them to think that their interests were practically very much the same—much more so than they were sometimes disposed to think—we should do a great deal of good. It was with sincere pleasure, therefore, that he had found himself able on the part of the Government to introduce these Bills; and he felt bound to say that he believed they would tend to show there was at the bottom a real, sound, good hearty feeling on the side both of masters and men. It was with considerable pain on that account, therefore, that he heard the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu), in the opening of the speech with which he had favoured the House that evening, describe the intention and purport of the Bills in a way which he hoped he should not be exceeding Parliamentary usage in describing as equally untrue, unjust, and ungenerous. He (Mr. Cross) would say they were brought forward from totally different motives. He thought he had made it perfectly clear when he introduced these Bills the other night, that if there was one thing more than another, from the beginning to the end, which tended to the benefit of the working men, it was the doing away with that law which so much puzzled and confused them, and from time to time exposed them to so many unjust punishments,—he meant the law of conspiracy. What, then, was his surprise when next day he saw in the papers that, while the noble Lord passed over the Employers and Workmen Bill, he proposed to read the Conspiracy Bill that day three months. He therefore argued that, however much the noble Lord had studied the Bill, he did not understand it, and when he asked the noble Lord to read it a second time, it was plain he had not read it even a first time. He, therefore, would pass over the noble Lord's speech, which had not met with a favourable response from any hon. Member who had hitherto spoken, and as he had, perhaps, at unwarrantable length, detained the House when introducing the subject, he would not take up its time by alluding any further to the speech of the noble Lord. All he would say was this—If the noble Lord's language to persons connected with trades unions was couched in such terms as he had employed that evening, it would not be very surprising that they should be astounded and brought to wrong conclusions—especially when they heard such phrases as “grandiloquent amphibology,” which he was free to confess he did not understand. He also regretted very much to hear the noble Lord's exposition of the right hon. and learned Recorder's Charge. He thought he might venture to say to the noble Lord, without transgressing any of the rules of the House, that, having read a short passage from the beginning of that Charge, he might also have read the conclusion of it. He did not think that a clearer exposition of the law, so far as picketing was concerned, could be made than the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave in that Charge. He only wished that it could be made absolutely clear that what he had said was the law of the land. He did not believe that after the Report of the Commission, after that Charge, and after the debates which they had had in that House, any misunderstanding in the future could arise on that point. He believed the law to be as laid down in the Report of the Commission and the Charge; and Baron Cleasby's judgment, when fairly considered, did not differ from either. He only wished the law clearly understood throughout the length and breadth of the land. Nobody, he believed, wanted any different law from that which was contained in the Charge. He believed all honest and well-intentioned men were satisfied with it, and he did not think any honest, well-intentioned master wanted any other. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Mr. Lowe), for what he had stated, in the most candid and open way, as to the intentions of the Government in relation to this Act. The right hon. Gentleman had made several suggestions, some of which were worth consideration, as there were others from which he rather differed. The right hon. Gentleman rather found fault with the power to rescind contracts. He thought that a novelty in procedure which should not be sanctioned, but he forgot that, in a clause of Lord Elcho's Act of 1867 that power existed. It was recommended by the Committee which sat before that Bill was framed, and he was not at all certain that many masters were opposed to it. There was a sort of marriage in such cases from which it might be very proper there should be a divorce. There were other matters that might deserve consideration—one was whether a person ordered to perform a contract should be allowed to give security himself. A good deal might be said in favour of that suggestion; but with regard to other sureties, he thought that a most valuable part of the Bill. Again, the right hon. Gentleman said, although he did not find any fault with the tribunal, he did not like giving the power to the County Courts to send parties to prison under the Insolvent Debtors' Act. He (Mr. Cross) could not, however, see why these cases should be placed in any other position than an ordinary debt. If the power of recovering small debts were abolished, the one case might go with the other; but treating the question as one of damages to be given, he could not see why the damages should be treated in any other way than as a debt under the Act. Anything else would be resorting to exceptional legislation. Then the right hon. Gentleman asked why this Bill should not be applied to menial servants. That was rather a matter of detail, and did not affect the main question which they were now discussing. Having thus referred to the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman, he was happy to say he was relieved from detaining the House at greater length, because he had no further objections to answer. He (Mr. Cross) hoped that masters would see and recognize that what had been said by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) was quite correct as to the injustice of one particular class of contracts being dealt with in a manner totally different from other contracts; workmen said why should a mere breach of contract on their part subject them to imprisonment, when a manufacturer who entered into a contract for a supply of wool or cotton, the breach of which entailed precisely the same amount of injury, was only civilly responsible, and could not be sent to prison? The only answer was, the one had a pocket, and the other had not. What was the consequence of such a state of the law? The men said they would not take any contract which would subject them to such ignominy; and many of their contracts were rather implied than expressed by the payment of wages at certain times. They would not enter into any contract beyond the day, hour, or minute. If the law remained as it was, that state of things would become more general than it was. If there was any great struggle between masters and men, it would make no difference to the men whether they left on Saturday or Wednesday; and so long as the present law existed they would leave on Saturday night without saying a single syllable, and not go back on Monday morning. Thus they found out the way of escaping the criminal laws, and the result would be only to increase the ill-feeling which already existed. Therefore this Bill said freely and fairly all such breaches of contract should be treated not criminally, but civilly, and nothing more. The object of the Bill was not to destroy trades unions; but as there was to be absolute freedom of will between master and servant, he (Mr. Cross) said there should also be absolute freedom between a man and his fellow-servant—a man should work if he liked, he should not work if he did not like; he should belong to a trades union if he liked, but should not be compelled to belong to a trades union. He believed the great object of all good government in England was not to create penalties and misdemeanours and summary convictions of all kinds—and he would like to have a Return of all the summary convictions that had been created for the last 10 years—but that there should exist, so far as was consistent with general public order, the greatest amount of individual freedom of action it was possible to attain.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had much pleasure in joining in the congratulations which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had received both with reference to the Bill itself and the speech by which it had been introduced. That speech was one of the clearest and most satisfactory expositions which he had heard. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman still more on the chance he had, and the good hope he must have, of being the means of settling the labour and capital question. He thought the right hon. Gentleman must be encouraged in that hope by the discussion which had arisen to-night. The short speech he had just made showed that the right hon. Gentleman had studied the question, and his practical observations with reference to the suggestions of his right hon. Friend the Member for London University showed an anxious desire to meet them as far as possible. He could not help expressing an earnest hope that the right hon. Gentleman, having taken the subject in hand, would not shrink from his task, but would thoroughly complete it by dealing with the Criminal Law Amendment Act. Of this he was certain, that in performing it the right hon. Gentleman would find the House and the country willing to aid him in removing that which was still objectionable in the criminal law. It was quite true that Judges, such as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder, had given a very clear idea of what was the intention of the Legislature in the making of the existing law, and of what was the spirit of the law. There was, however, great vagueness with regard to the letter of the law. It was interpreted in very different ways by both masters and men. On the one hand, it was a trap for the men, who fancied that they could do things which perhaps were illegal; and on the other hand, as was seen in a recent case, some masters wished to use the law for purposes for which it was not intended. It was quite clear that the word "coerce," upon which all depended, was subject to more interpretations than one, and that its true meaning ought to be clearly defined. The important relations of labour and capital, which had greatly improved, would be still further improved by debates such as the present and by the action of the Government. They could not hope to avoid disputes between masters and men, but it was in the interests of both that means of reconciling their differences should be afforded to them. With respect to the important branch of the subject which related to intimidating and obstructing workmen, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would consider the Amendment to which reference had been made. They could not expect to get rid of strikes altogether, and while they lasted the labourers would try and find out who took their places, and, as far as he could see, there was no harm in their endeavouring to induce them not to work. He thought if by the adoption of those or some other words he should render the Bill a perfect solution of a very difficult legal proposition,

Her Majesty's Government might go to the Recess with—to use an American phrase—a very good record before their own friends, and they might do so with the feeling that many of those who sat on his (Mr. Forster's) side, when they went to the country would not be able to say much against them. At any rate, they had secured this advantage—that one or two very important principles were acknowledged. One was that the legal relations between labour and capital were to be treated in the same way as were the ordinary business relations of life; and next, that contracts between master and man were to be conducted in the same way as contracts between any other buyer and seller were. Those principles had been expressed in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and it was satisfactory to find that they were adopted in the Bill.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he also had to thank the Home Secretary for having introduced the Bill. Every right-minded employer of labour would hail with satisfaction the removal of the last remnant of penal laws, and that, in future, disputes between master and servant would be settled by the civil law, and also that the employer and the employed were to be placed on a perfect system of equality so far as the law was concerned. He considered the remarks of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) with regard to the tinplate masters of Swansea unjustifiable. In writing the letter they did, warning the masters not to employ the men, they only adopted the principle admitted by the hon. Member—the right of any workman to endeavour by fair argument to induce others to adopt a particular course. He demurred altogether to such an act being classed with "picketing" or "rattening."

MR. BURT said, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had placed before the House his honest and well-meant attempt to settle a difficult subject. His speech on introducing the two measures gave evidence that he had well considered the question, and it was done in an admirable tone and spirit. Although he did not at all agree with the noble Lord who opened the debate (Lord Robert Montagu), that the House had never cared about the interests of the working man, still he believed that until very recently the House considered that the working man belonged to a different order and required different laws from those which applied to other classes. Wages were kept down by the law, trades unions were declared illegal, and when they ceased to be legal their funds were left without protection. However, the Act of 1867 was certainly a great step in advance, as was also the Trades Union Act of 1871, and the Bills before the House were a further step towards their relief; and although they did not go so far as they ought, they would go far to remove many of the grievances of which the working men complained. The right hon. Gentleman had laid down this broad principle very freely—that in future an ordinary breach of contract should be a civil offence simply, and that principle, if fully carried out, would go far to place the question of contract on a proper footing. There were clauses in the Bill, however, which would require a good deal of consideration in Committee, and that observation related especially to the 5th clause. He should like to know whether, under that clause, an act was to be regarded as criminal simply because of the large amount of the damage done; if so, that was a dangerous principle to lay down. It would be desirable to introduce several Amendments into the Bill in Committee. The tribunal before which the parties were to go was a great improvement upon our past legislation, and he wished the right hon. Gentleman could have gone further. There was a strong feeling of distrust in the minds of working men in being taken before a local magistrate. They did valuable service to the country, and gave up considerable time to the discharge of their duties, and no doubt, as a general rule, they endeavoured to administer the law fairly and justly; but as a rule they were employers of labour, and were prejudiced, and sympathized with them. It was a false position for them to be placed in. At the same time, he would equally object to employers being tried by working men. No doubt, the Home Secretary had gone as far as existing machinery would enable him, but it would be desirable to go further in the future. He deeply regretted, and it was shared in by a large number of persons outside the House, that the Home Secretary had not seen his way to deal with the Criminal Law Amendment Act. He did not go so far as the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath in defending the evils of rattening, and he had only given a qualified support to picketing, but he had never advocated it. He would throw no obstacle in the way of moral suasion and advice, which the right hon. Gentleman opposite said the law would allow of; but the legislation with regard to picketing was in a very unsatisfactory state; and being capable of such varied definitions, it would require the serious consideration of the House, and should be explained in a simple, clear, and intelligible form, so that it could not by possibility be misunderstood. The men who had been recently released were not the men for whom gaols ought to exist, and he was very glad to hear the Home Secretary state the other night that prisons should be the resort of criminals only. These men had simply given advice, and a very strong and irritated feeling was produced in the minds of the working classes by that conviction. The working men of this country were loyal, but their allegiance was strained to the greatest possible extent when that House passed laws that were not in harmony with the highest moral sense and intelligence of the community. When men were convicted and punished they ought to feel that they had merited the strongest reprobation for having committed an offence against the State; but here the case was different, and the men who were liberated a short time since were considered, and justly so, as "heroes and martyrs." The Criminal Law Amendment Act demanded the serious consideration of the House, and he hoped the Home Secretary, whose intentions were good, and who really comprehended the subject, would yet deal with it with a view to its amendment.

MR. M'LAREN said, he was induced to address a few words to the House because the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), in referring to the opinion of trades unions in the country regarding this Bill, had stated that the united trades of the city of Edinburgh had petitioned against the Bill. Now, he trusted neither the Home Secretary nor the House would suppose that opinion indicated the real opinion of the great constituency of Edinburgh. He begged leave to say that it did not, because the constituency of Edinburgh cordially approved of the main principle of these two Bills. At the last election for Edinburgh a number of candidates appeared, and the trades union leaders were determined that no man should be returned unless he would agree to the total repeal of the Criminal Law Amendment Act. He was not going to enter into any details, but he would simply say that those candidates who most entirely approved of the policy of the trades unions were found at the foot of the poll, and those candidates who in the strongest manner disapproved of the policy of trades unions, and maintained that the Criminal Law Amendment Act was, in substance, a right Act, and that the law against picketing was a proper law, were at the top of the poll at the election. He looked upon this as a very important fact coming from the constituency he had the honour to represent. He had a number of formal questions put to him, and he answered those questions in a careful manner. Having refreshed his memory by looking at those answers again, he found that they were identical in principle with the principles of these Bills. There was no necessity for picketing to extend beyond the hours at which workmen were going to and leaving their work. Trades unions comprised only a small proportion of the working men of the country; picketing had to be resorted to against those who did not belong to unions; and the object of it was to interfere with freedom of contract, and to endeavour to compel men to cease to work in particular places in which they were willing to work. He therefore held that it was essential—whatever might be done to bring about better relations between employer and employed, nothing was more essential than to protect one class of the employed against the tyranny of another class of the employed. The law against picketing he did not regard at all as a law to protect masters against workmen, but to protect one class of workmen against another class of workmen. Every workman in this free country ought to be able to go to work where he liked, and he agreed with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), who said he despised picketing because it was un-English, and ought not to exist in a country like this.

Mr. MUNDELLA explained what he said was that every Englishman had a repugnance to espionage.

Mr. M'Laren

Mr. M'LAREN said, that was exactly what he understood the hon. Member to say—namely, that he was opposed to picketing. He would make a suggestion in reference to one of the clauses of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER pointed out that it was not competent for the hon. Member at that stage of the Bill to enter into a discussion of the clauses.

Mr. M'LAREN, in conclusion, said, he cordially approved of the measures, and hoped they would be passed with as few Amendments as possible.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had, he thought, fully met the wish of the House in proposing as a measure of public policy to place employer and employed upon an equality before the law with respect to contracts; but some of the speakers in the course of the discussion appeared to have urged the right hon. Gentleman to go further, and his (Mr. Newdegate's) opinion was, that the Government would not be supported by public opinion in going any further in this direction. He had been an employer of labour for many years, and he had been exceedingly fortunate in one respect; because, although there had been at different times strikes all round his colliery in the district in which it was situated, there never had been a positive strike among his workmen. In that respect he had been very fortunate; but at times that good understanding had exposed them, both employer and employed, to very great pressure on the part of the trades unions, and from those who had interfered to disturb the labour of the district. He wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that the tendency of the legislation now before the House was to increase the power of the trades unions. Every impediment that they removed in the sense of the old law of conspiracy was an encouragement to trades unionism. He had never resented any man's belonging to a union if he thought fit; but he had been made sensible, and so had many others, workmen as well as employers, of a disposition to exercise a something more than moral terrorism on the part of those unions; and at present they seemed determined not only to decide, where they could, how industry should be controlled, but to erect tribunals of their own, totally irresponsible to any other authority, for the decision of all questions relating to labour. His opinion was that, after those Bills had passed, the Legislature would have not only to recognize these trades unions, but they would be compelled to regulate them, for trades unionism was becoming a source of great power, was in fact, creating a new jurisdiction. Those trades unions were practically large employers of labour for their own purposes, and had formed organizations, armed with large funds, collected from the whole United Kingdom, the pressure of which might at any time be directed upon some single sphere of industry with most oppressive effect; and that was done by persons connected officially with those trades unions, who seemed lightly to regard the laws relating to libel, or slander, while impugning the conduct of those with whom they might happen not to agree, or whose action they desired to control. If further scope was to be given to that system of combination, it would, he thought, be found essential that that system, that those trades unions, should be more than merely recognized by law; that they should be made responsible for any injury they might inflict. That was the view he took of the present position, and of the probable effect of that Bill. In common with the whole House he cordially recognized the worthy intentions of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Home Department, as embodied in it; but his own experience suggested that he should give his voice in support of the few words of wholesome caution which fell from the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren). It seemed to him that if the Legislature proceeded thus far in facilitating the action of trades unionism, it must also be prepared, not merely to recognize, but to regulate trades unions, and to render them corporately responsible for any damage they might inflict.

MR. HOPWOOD, viewing the Bill on its intrinsic merits, considered that it justified most of what had been said in its favour; but he contended there were certain details which might usefully occupy attention in Committee. He trusted that the House would not agree to the clause giving power to imprison an apprentice for one month upon his committing a breach of contract, because he believed it would do more harm than good. The Home Secretary had certainly drawn the question of conspiracy out of the vague position in which it stood at common law; but he had still left it in such a position as that the mouths of men charged with the offence were shut when on their trial, and they were not even permitted to call their wives as witnesses on their behalf. He hoped the Secretary of State would see his way to altering this provision, when the Bill was in Committee, for without such permission, it was impossible that the law could be effectually carried out. He also hoped pains would be taken to define more clearly than was the case at present the offence of coercion which was to be punishable under the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. J. G. HUBBARD, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That it is inexpedient, as proposed by this Bill, to require by law the reduction of the National Debt, by annual accounts of constantly-increasing magnitude, without any limitations of time," said, the Bill had been read a second time without any discussion, and through the forms of the House he had not, since the Motion for going into Committee, had an opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for an elucidation of some of the provisions of the plan which he thought required explanation in order to make them satisfactory. He had drawn up his Amendment in as precise terms as possible, so as to prevent misconception of the character of the proposal which he had made to the right hon. Gentleman, and which was that £5,000,000 should be yearly set aside, and be an item in the Budget expenditure for the purchase and cancellation of Government Stock in the open market. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract had stated that his proposal was a regular conundrum; but that right hon. Gentleman had since admitted to him that when he used that expression he had not made himself acquainted with the real character of the proposal. The same right hon. Member had committed himself to an assertion which showed that he had not mastered the question of Terminable Annuities, when he spoke of the connection existing between a possible surplus and those Annuities: when in the very nature of things they were opposed to each other, the surplus being an asset and the Terminable Annuities being so many Government liabilities. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Budget speech, expatiated with very great truth on the great inconvenience of one feature belonging to Terminable Annuities—namely, their spasmodic action. He had himself, therefore, suggested a scheme of Terminable Annuities for the reduction of the Debt which would be regular and continuous in its operation year by year, and not open to objection on account of its spasmodic character. The objections which were raised to his plan in the previous debates were founded on an entire misconception of its character. He maintained that, so far from their being able to apply an annually increasing sum to the reduction of the National Debt as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, it would be impossible, as the Debt became diminished, to go on applying even the same sum to its reduction. He should be glad, therefore, to hear what were the right hon. Gentleman's ultimate and deliberate views as to the amount of Debt which it would be practicable to redeem from year to year. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take due time to consider the question, they might, perhaps, in another Session, have a measure on that subject connected with the Savings Banks introduced in a shape which might meet with the acceptance of the House. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

The Amendment, not being seconded, was not put.

MR. LOWE: Sir, I wish to offer a few words of explanation to the House in vindication of myself. In the debate on going into Committee on this Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was vigorously attacked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, for having, as he said, trusted to the normal increment of the taxes to meet some extra expenditure beyond that which was provided for. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his reply, stated that this zeal of my right hon. Friend seemed to be an intermittent one, and then he quoted Questions that were asked me in 1872, to this effect—

"Mr. Selater-Booth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer . . . Although the right hon. Gentleman estimated his surplus at a little over £300,000, he gave the Committee to understand, with some complacency, that it would probably be his duty to propose later on in the year a Supplementary Estimate of £400,000, and that sum he proposed to meet by the growth of Revenue, of which he had taken no account in his Estimate of the present year."

And then the answer I gave was also read—

"The Chancellor of the Exchequer: That is quite true. But, on the other hand, I have taken no credit for the corresponding increase on the other side which will make up the deficiency, and more than make it up."

So that the Chancellor of the Exchequer argued from these premises, and, I am bound to say, with very great force and plausibility, that while he was being taken to task by my right hon. Friend for having counted on the normal increase of the Revenue—that is, on something beyond the Estimates he laid before the House, to meet his liabilities, I had been guilty of the very same thing, whatever the offence might amount to. It certainly appeared a very fair retort, and I was not at the moment able to give the explanation which was required. I felt confident in my own mind that I had not done so; but I was not then prepared to prove it, therefore I have remained all this while under the imputation. I have, however, looked into the matter, and it stands thus—It is perfectly true that I had only a surplus of £300,000 in 1872. It is also perfectly true that I said that, judging by the experience of other years, and knowing that Supplementary Estimates ever since the passing of the Exchequer and Audit Act have become a matter of necessity, I estimated that the Supplementary Estimate would be the same as it was the year before—that is, £420,000; and it is also perfectly true that I said I had made no provision for the odd £120,000 beyond my £300,000 estimated surplus, but had trusted to the increase of the Revenue for it. So far, therefore, nothing could seem clearer against me than the state of the case, and the allegation seems to be borne out. But there is one important fact which could only be discovered by reading—as I have been obliged to read—the Budget Speech of the year, and that fact is this:—I estimated my Revenue, and I never varied my opinion of what that Revenue would be so long as the circumstances remained the same as when I made the Estimate. I took off £3,300,000 in taxes—income tax, 2*d.* in the pound, and other things—and then I left myself a surplus of £300,000; and having this Supplementary Estimate to meet, and having only that £300,000 estimated under the altered circumstances of the case—that is, these Estimates having been made before I took off this £3,300,000, and looking at them after that was taken off—I did presume that the relief to the taxpayer of £3,300,000 would have the effect of increasing the Estimates of the year to an extent larger than the £120,000 which I was short of. That, of course, has no resemblance to the case referred to by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I did not rely on the Estimates under the same circumstances; but I relied that after the very great change in taxation that had taken place, the Revenue would be increased in consequence of it, and I maintain that my expectations were fully realized, because not only did I get the £120,000, but I got a surplus of no less than £4,700,000 for the next year. I do not know that I have been unfairly misrepresented in the matter, because it was a mistake very natural to fall into under the circumstances; but the explanation shows that whether my right hon. Friend was right or wrong in what he did, my case was distinct from his, because the Estimates I relied on were subject to increase, not from the normal increment of expenditure, but from causes which I myself had set in motion.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS thought that the course taken in reference to this Bill was somewhat unfortunate as regarded the point of its effect upon the permanency of the income tax. Neither the House nor the country had up to the present moment had any explanation as to whether by this Bill it was intended directly or indirectly that the income tax should form a permanent portion of the Revenue of the country. It seemed to him, however, the measure would really involve the retention of that tax indefi-nately for the purpose of paying off Debt, and that the real meaning of the Bill was that the income tax was to be perpetuated. It might be that at the present time, with that tax at a very low rate, people were quiescent in regard to the matter; but if it was to become a permanent source of Revenue, the time would come when it would be treated by Chancellors of the Exchequer as it had been treated before, as a balancing item to be increased at pleasure, and the result would be its becoming a continually irritating sore in the minds and the pockets of the people of this country. The inquisitorial character of the tax, its tendency to promote fraud, its inequality of incidence, were just as great as ever. In the course of the next eight or ten years there would be a large reduction in the amount of interest payable upon the National Debt, and it being anticipated that an agitation would then commence in favour of the abolition of the tax, this measure was brought in with a view of binding Parliament, and preventing it from yielding to that agitation. At the present moment the tax produced some £4,000,000 per annum, while the interest payable on the Terminable Annuities amounted to somewhere about £4,500,000 per annum, and therefore it was evident that the finances of the country had been so worked that at the present time the income tax was maintained for the purpose of providing a fund for paying off Debt. At the time of the Crimean War the tax was used as a tax for a great national purpose, about which the whole nation was agreed; but since then the truth was that the nation had been induced to forget the bargains which successive Ministers of the Crown had made with it in connection with this tax, and there was great danger that the tax would eventually be allowed to slide into and become a part of the permanent Revenue of the country. Successive Prime Ministers and Chancellors of the Exchequer had been committed on that point, and yet the effect of our financial policy during the last 15 years had simply been to bring us to this state of things—that the income tax was now required and maintained for the purpose of paying off Debt. He had always looked with regret to the possibility of its being said that under a Conservative Government with a Conservative majority the tax should be made permanent. The tax in its present form was unequal and unjust, promoted fraud, and was productive of great evils amongst the commercial classes; and he therefore wished to justify his conduct on this occasion by saying that were he to remain silent he should hereafter be taunted with having been a consenting party to the permanent retention of the tax by having sanctioned this Bill. If he were forced to do so alone, he should be willing to go into the Lobby by himself to vote against it. He begged to move an Amendment in somewhat similar terms to that which had been moved by the right hon. Member for the City of London on the Motion for going into Committee upon the Bill, to the effect—

"That, as reduction of Debt implies taxation in excess of the requirements of the State for the services of the year, the pressure of the income tax should be diminished to the extent of the interest saved upon the amount of Debt previously redeemed."

The Amendment, not being seconded, was not put.

MR. FAWCETT thought that as the third reading of the Bill had been on the Order Book for some time without any Notice being given of opposition to it, the hon. Member for Londonderry had adopted an unusual and inconvenient course in raising a discussion on the subject now. What the hon. Member had said would certainly not induce him (Mr. Fawcett) to oppose the Bill, but rather supplied him with an additional argument for supporting it. He should not have troubled the House with any remarks, but for the fact that the discussion of the Bill had hitherto been confined to the two front benches, and because he feared from the manner in which the subject had been treated on his own side of the House, that an impression might be created in the country that if the Liberal Party returned to office they would not consider that it was under any very strong obligations to continue the principle and plan embodied in the measure. A question of greater importance could scarcely come before the House than that which had reference to the reduction of the National Debt, and he regretted that it should be obscured by the raising of the issue as to the relative advantages of Terminable Annuities and a fixed appropriation. It was admitted that the time had come when they were bound by every sentiment of patriotism to make a sincere effort to reduce the Debt. He cared not how it was reduced. It was of the first importance that it should be reduced; it was of secondary importance whether that should be done by Terminable Annuities or by fixed appropriations. For his own part, he felt bound in candour to say that he could not see any difference whatever in the relative advantages of a Terminable Annuity and a Sinking Fund. The Debt could not be reduced by ingenious book-keeping, or by a clever manipulation of figures; there was one way and one way only of reducing the Debt, and that was by obtaining a greater amount of Revenue than the actual charges of the year; and if you obtained a surplus, it was a matter of no moment whether it was applied in the form of reducing the Debt by Terminable Annuities or in the simple form of cancelling Stock. So far as he understood the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he had a surplus, there was nothing whatever to prevent him resorting to Terminable Annuities as a means of reducing the Debt. There was, therefore, no necessity for the House involving itself in all those intricacies about Terminable Annuities and a Sinking Fund. The simple question the House had to consider was whether the Debt was more likely to be reduced by the passing of that Bill or not. He believed that such a Bill must exercise a very important influence in the reduction of the Debt. What, he asked, was the use in saying that a Sinking Fund would fail now as it had failed in the time of Mr. Pitt? A scheme for the reduction of Debt which would have been impolitic 50 years ago might now, in the altered circumstances of the country, in its present condition of prosperity, be perfectly politic now. It was quite true that they could not control the future, and that a scheme which was accepted this year might become nugatory next year; but did the House think that if such a Bill as that under consideration had been passed by the late Government, the present Government, with a surplus of £5,000,000 last year, could have proposed the repeal of the horse duty, and have altogether ignored the subject of the reduction of the Debt? It would be easy for the political opponents of the Government to ask them this question—how it was that they had adopted what seemed to him (Mr. Fawcett) a somewhat undignified course for a Government to adopt, that when they had, as last year, £6,000,000 to spare they did nothing for the reduction of Debt, whereas now, when they had nothing in their coffers, they proposed to do a good deal. The question involved was of far greater moment than the personal credit due to the Government. By passing the Bill the House would bind itself to the principle that some serious effort ought to be made to reduce the National Debt, and would tie up the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the amount of money he would have to spend. He hoped the House would not be so unwise and so unpatriotic as to oppose the passing of the Bill. When we reflected on what our predecessors had done for us, we could not think it any undue sacrifice on our part to set aside an insignificant portion of our vast accumulated wealth for the benefit of our posterity. He believed it was no exaggeration to say that England was at least 10 times wealthier now than she was 60 years ago, and the burden of the National Debt was twice heavier then than it was now. We certainly ought not to let these days of prosperity pass without reducing our liabilities, for less happy times might come, when the Debt would be a heritage of difficulty and danger to the country, and he hoped the Bill would not only be passed, but that it would be patriotically carried out.

MR. ANDERSON said, the right hon. Member for the City of London argued that there was no connection between Terminable Annuities and a surplus, because the former was a liability and the latter was an asset; but that really was exactly where the connection lay, because the asset would be needed to pay the liability, and no prudent Chancellor of the Exchequer would ever undertake to create those Terminable Annuities unless there was a prospect of a surplus to redeem them afterwards. The right hon. Member also spoke of Terminable Annuities being a spasmodic affair; but for his (Mr. Anderson's) own part he thought it was the most regular way of paying, and he preferred that the reduction of the Debt should be carried out by that means, rather than by fixed appropriations, provided it was not carried too far. He did not at all like the proposal of the right hon. Member to set aside a fixed sum of £5,000,000 continuously every year for the reduction of the Debt. He should like to know how the money was to be raised—it could only be done by laying on new taxation, and he, for one, decidedly objected to new taxation for that purpose. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had said a great deal about the sacrifices our forefathers had made for us, and argued from that our duty to pay the Debt. He differed entirely from that deduction. He very willingly admitted that we should honour our forefathers for what they had done in preserving the freedom of the country. But they did not do it for us; they did it for themselves—we were not thought of at that time. What our forefathers did for us was to hand down the bill to pay, and they handed down to us a great load of Debt; and while he was anxious that this generation should do nothing to increase that Debt, should even do something to reduce it, it was most important that that should be done as easily as they could. He denied that there was any reason for making any great sacrifice for the purpose of paying a Debt which we did not incur. The analogy of the hon. Member for Hackney between the individual and the country did not hold good in that respect. He saw very little objection to reducing the Debt slowly, and he thought they had done very well indeed so far. The sum as at present proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer out of the £28,000,000 was not very burdensome, and not very large; but he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) about its gradually increasing importance—that while now the sum apportioned to reduction was less than £1,000,000, as Annuities fell in it would soon increase to £8,000,000, £10,000,000, £12,000,000, or even £20,000,000. But he had no doubt before that time arrived this Bill would be upset, for no Chancellor of the Exchequer could resist the temptation of laying his hands on that splendid sum. He did not consider that that amount of taxation of £28,000,000 could be kept up permanently without, as the hon. Member for Londonderry said, making the income tax perpetual; and as he considered that the passing of the Bill would tend to have that effect, he would vote against the measure.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH expressed his belief that if there had been a strong feeling in the country against the income tax it would have manifested itself at the last General Election. He regarded the impost as a most legitimate one. But for the income tax, a man with £50,000 a-year, if he lived in lodgings and refrained from consuming taxed articles, might avoid paying a single farthing to the country. It was hard on the people in general to have to pay taxes when so many men with immense incomes had the power of escaping from every sort of subscription to their country; and it was on that ground that he was in favour of an income tax, which was the only means of touching men of very large property who would not pay a farthing in any other way. It was all very well for hon. Members to say that it was intended as a war tax, but they did not, happily, often go to war.

MR. E. J. REED said, he was very glad that some attention had been paid by the Government to the often-repeated wish of some hon. Members on both sides of the House that a determined effort should be made to reduce the National Debt, and he was sorry that the efforts of the Government in that respect had been represented to be an attempt, as they had no surplus, to create a fictitious credit for themselves, and that, too, by a process which would impose all the burden of this system on their successors. There might be some truth in that representation if it had been uttered with reference to a Government that was about to expire, but it was uttered with reference to a Government in its second year of office, and apparently in the prime of its strength. He sympathized with the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) with reference to the income tax, and should be sorry to find that we were more permanently committed to it than before; but the views of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), so very well expressed, entirely accorded with his own, and he was not at all prepared to support the opposition offered to the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the contrary, his conscientious opinion was that it was a good thing in prosperous times to make some effort to reduce the National Debt of the country.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR supported the Bill, and agreed in the main with the statements and arguments of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). He advocated the maintenance of the income tax on the broad ground on which it was re-established by Sir Robert Peel, in view to changes in the taxation of the country, which bore unfairly and unequally on classes of trade. No doubt, great changes had been effected in the Customs and with immense benefit to the country. But there still remained burdensome taxes which might be abrogated or reduced. The duties on coffee, on tea, on chicory, on wine, and on fruits, still needed reform. Then, the burdens on shipping urgently needed attention to enable this country to compete successfully with other countries. There were also the duties on carriages, male servants, on guns, urgently needing relief. But still more important was the bad system of granting aids from the Imperial Exchequer towards local taxation. That bad and dangerous form of aiding localities to expend public money should be discontinued, and to that end the income tax should be applied in order to transfer to localities all those taxes which were raised locally, such as licences of every description, all of which, including the gun, dog, and game licences, should be appropriated to local uses, and the aids from the Imperial Exchequer discontinued. And with regard to the paying off of the National Debt, it appeared of little importance whether that was effected by Terminable Annuities which originated in the reign of Queen Anne, or in the direction of buying up or cancelling Consols, or to the form of a Sinking Fund as now proposed. The whole question resolved itself into one of practical administration, so difficult to enforce, that of actually doing it.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he could not support an Amendment which would defeat the measure, which he regarded as a valuable one. He could not help thinking that the statement of the hon. Member for Londonderry that hon. Members committed themselves at the last Election to the abolition of the income tax was too broad an assertion. In his opinion, anything which would have the effect of abolishing direct taxation would be simply a step in the wrong direction. Without some form of direct taxation, an unfair proportion of the national expenditure would fall on the shoulders of the working classes. But while he intended to support the present Bill, he thought it was a strong condemnation of last year's Budget. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke strongly in favour of appropriating £28,000,000 a-year to the reduction of the National Debt. But what were the facts? Why, that in the present year, he would only be enabled to set aside for that purpose £27,400,000, next year £27,800,000, and it would only be the year after he could set aside £28,000,000, or the sum set down in the Bill. He could not understand that anyone who proposed to reduce the National Debt at all could regard the sum proposed by the right hon. Gentleman as too large for that purpose. Those who were opposed to reducing it believed that in a few years they would be called on to make less sacrifices than they did at present. He thought it would not be prudent to take so sanguine a view. At the same time, he thought that there was a disadvantage in Terminable Annuities, and in the scheme proposed in the Bill. He preferred a simple repayment, for when the interest annually payable was seen to be diminishing the people of this country would be better able to appreciate the advantage of reducing the Debt. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had said that the Bill, even if such a scheme became law, would probably be upset in a few years; but, at any rate, the Bill would throw the onus probandi upon those who sought to reduce taxation. The right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) appeared to be under the apprehension that we should pay off the Debt too rapidly; but he (Sir John Lubbock) did not share in that fear, because he was only too much afraid that the process would be stopped prematurely. He regarded the Bill as an honest expression on the part of Her Majesty's Government that the reduction of the Debt was a wise policy, and a duty which they owed to the country, and therefore he should give the measure his hearty support.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not trouble the House with many observations, seeing that he had already addressed it two or three times on the subject of the Bill. He was, however, anxious to take the last opportunity of expressing his thanks to various hon. Gentlemen who had spoken, especially to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), who had so very ably and powerfully expressed the opinions which had guided the Government in proposing the measure; to the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Lubbock) who had just sat down; and to other hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, for the spirit of frankness and candour which they had displayed, and which he believed really reflected the opinion of the great majority of the country. He believed that the time had now come when there was a very general feeling of accord in favour of making a sustained effort towards the reduction of the Debt, and he thought there was a sounder and more generous feeling afloat than that expressed by the hon. Member for the city of Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) with regard to our duty to our ancestors on the one hand, and to our posterity on the other. It was hardly generous to speak of our ancestors as though they had left us nothing else than a Debt which we had to pay. They had made not only great sacrifices in their financial arrangements, but great personal sacrifices, and endured great personal hardships, and developed a power of endurance, which raised this country to the pitch of glory which she had so long maintained, and of which she was now so proud. And when he came to the financial question, let him remind hon. Members that, although it was quite true that a nation engaged in a formidable struggle for existence and independence ought to pay its way as far as it could, yet it might be impossible for it to raise the sums necessary to meet its expenditure, without laying such burdens upon it as would have choked its rising industries and would have strangled its future prospects in its cradle. He was of opinion, then, that our ancestors did wisely in borrowing rather than increase taxation beyond what the nation could bear, and in not being in too great a hurry to pay off the Debt until our finances were in a condition to bear the strain. But what was laudable in the case of our ancestors would be very wrong for us to adopt. We were now enjoying a period of great prosperity; our people were happily not overburdened with taxes, and were able to pursue their avocations with very few inconveniences and restrictions, and therefore now was the time to make an effort and endeavour to reduce our Debt. The question then was, in what way were we to reduce that Debt? He did not approve of mere spasmodic efforts in that direction, which would be influenced by temporary political exigencies and by fluctuating finances; but he thought that we ought to systematize our efforts so as not to inconvenience the country, but at the same time make a real and permanent effect upon our Debt. We were now paying off our Debt, as far as the Terminable Annuities were concerned, at the rate of £3,700,000 per annum, and all that he asked the House to do by this Bill was to sanction the continuance of the present burden upon the country until circumstances should arise when it might become prudent for the Government of the day to propose a change in the scheme. The pressure upon the country, owing to its growing prosperity, would fortunately be less and less, while the impression upon the Debt would be greater and greater year by year. He had been asked whether he proposed to bind the country by this Bill for all time, and to that inquiry he replied that it was impossible to bind the country for all time, because it was impossible to bind any future or even the present Parliament beyond the present Session. There were, undoubtedly, two limitations to the Government proposal. One was, that if a time should arrive when it would be impossible with advantage to get Stock enough to redeem, it would be open to the Financial Minister of the day to propose some different legislation; and the other limitation was, that if a time came when our circumstances greatly altered, and when we were called upon to make far greater exertions than at present, then we should have on this system a reserve which would easily and properly be made applicable to prevent the necessity of borrowing, and to substitute for borrowing simply a cessation of paying off the Debt. But as matters stood at present what the Government asked them to do was a very simple matter, involving little or no sacrifice beyond what they were now willing to submit to. He would not go into the particular questions at issue between the right hon. Member for the City of London and himself. He admitted the authority of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) was such that he should be sorry to set up his judgment against that of the right hon. Member; but, at the same time, he thought his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) proposal was in no way inconsistent with that of the right hon. Gentleman. As regarded what had been said by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis), he denied altogether that the Bill would have the effect the hon. Gentleman supposed in respect of the income tax. That question lay apart from this measure, and ought not to be argued in connection with it. The Bill in no way militated against what he had laid down in his Budget speech, and that was, that in regard to the income tax we ought not to use it as a financial makeweight in order to get a balance every year, but that the object should be, so long as we paid the tax, to keep it low and uniform. He would not enter further into any discussion of the measure, which he thought had already been sufficiently discussed, and would only express a hope that it might prove satisfactory to the interests of the country.

MR. MUNDELLA protested against the doctrine laid down by the hon. Member for Mid-Cheshire (Colonel Egerton Leigh) and the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), that at the last General Election the country agreed to the perpetuation of the income tax. His opinion was, that at the last Election the impression was strong that whatever Party came into power the income tax would be abolished. He should support the Bill for the reasons which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had assigned. He did not believe that it involved the perpetuation of the income tax. If he believed it would do so, he would not support it. But he agreed that in the present state of the country they were bound to make some fair and honest attempt to reduce, as far as possible, the mass of the Debt.

LAND TITLES AND TRANSFER BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General.)

[BILL 105.] [Lords.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title.)

MR. RATHBONE wished to make an appeal to the Government. He thought there should be some system of transfer for small properties, which the Bill did not effect.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the question before the Committee was the first clause, relating to the title of the Bill, to which point the observations of the hon. Gentleman must be addressed.

MR. RATHBONE said, the title of the Bill was not a correct one, for the measure did not carry out the cheap transfer of land. It was most important that the Government should take time, and should avail themselves of their immense power in order to produce a real Bill which should provide for the cheap transfer of land in small as well as large quantities. He suggested that the Bill should be postponed until next Session.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER agreed with much that had been said by the hon. Member for Liverpool. You did not simplify a title by registering it. To simplify a title to real property you must make it rather more like the title to personalty, and abolish the distinction between legal and equitable estates.

THE CHAIRMAN again pointed out that the question before the Committee was not the general principle of the Bill, and called attention to the inconvenience of renewing discussions on the principle of the Bill upon every clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application of Act).

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had given Notice of an Amendment the object of which was to include customary freeholds in the Bill. Many of these were freeholds in every respect except in name, the only difference being that they were held at a small quit-rent; a case which would be provided for by the 1st sub-section of the 18th clause. Some, however, might be practically copyholds, and as they would be dealt with by the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Sussex (Mr. Gregory), he would withdraw his own proposal in favour of that of his hon. Friend.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GREGORY moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 14, after "freehold" to insert—

"in any case in which an admission or any act by the lord of the manor is necessary to perfect the title of a purchase from the customary tenant."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Construction of terms of Act).

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Amendment made, in page 2, after line 11, add—

"The definition of land contained in the Act of the thirteenth and fourteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter twenty-one, intituled 'An Act for shortening the language used in Acts of Parliament,' shall not apply to this Act."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Application for registration with an absolute title or with a possessory title only).

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN moved an Amendment enabling any trustee with absolute power of sale to register himself under the Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the case was provided for in Clause 7.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GREGORY proposed an Amendment with a similar object, believing that the clause ought to describe all the classes of persons who would be entitled to avail themselves of it.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Evidence of title required on application).

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Amendment made, in page 2, line 37, by inserting after "notices," "if any."

Clause as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 16, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Regulations as to examination of title by registrar).

SIR GEORGE BOWYER suggested that the wording of the clause should be made more definite with respect to the form of notice required to be given by objectors to the registrar.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18 (Liability of registered land to easements and certain other rights).

MR. ALFRED MARTEN proposed an Amendment, the object of which was to protect the rights of lords of manors in respect of mines and minerals.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped his hon. and learned Friend would withdraw the Amendment, as it was unnecessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19 to 40, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 41 (Transmission on death of freehold land).

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 14, line 4, to leave out from "such persons" to end of clause, and insert—

"The heir-at-law or the devisee in fee simple (as the case may be) of such sole registered proprietor, or of the survivor of such joint proprietors, shall be entitled to be registered as proprietor in his place."

MR. JACKSON thought the Amendment would make matters rather worse than they were under the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JACKSON moved the insertion of words providing that if no person has been appointed by a deceased proprietor of registered land to take his place on the register, or if such person be unwilling to act, the executor or administrator of the deceased proprietor shall be entitled to be registered. This Amendment would greatly encourage and cheapen the registration of small properties.

Amendment proposed,

In page 14, line 5, to leave out from the words "may, on the application," to the end of the Clause, and insert the words "such sole deceased proprietor or the survivor of such joint proprietors has by will or codicil appointed in that behalf. If no person has been so appointed, or if the person so appointed is unwilling to act, or there is any obstacle or impediment in the way of his registration, the executor or administrator of such sole deceased proprietor or of the survivor of such joint proprietors shall be entitled to be registered as proprietor in his place: Provided, That nothing in this section shall render any such executor or administrator liable in respect of such land to the payment of any duty charged on probate or letters of administration,"—(Mr. Jackson),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'may, on the application,' stand part of the Clause."

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, considering the importance of the clause and the advanced hour—a quarter to 1 o'clock—said, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir George Bowyer.)

* THE ATTORNEY GENERAL expressed a hope that the Bill would be proceeded with.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he regarded the clause as a most dangerous one, involving a serious and questionable change in the existing law. He would, however, withdraw the Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD pointed out that the question was a most important one, and hoped it would be possible in some way or other to avoid the great expenses which would be involved before the registrar.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment. The object of the hon. and learned Member was to lessen the expense of registration; but he did not think that the Amendment would make it less costly than the clause as it stood. He intended to move an Amendment which he thought would meet the case better than the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member.

CANADA COPYRIGHT BILL—(No. 157.)
(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that as he had stated to their Lordships on the second reading, the Bill would prohibit the importation into this country of English copyright books reprinted in Canada. He was now about to move Amendments, the objects of which were to allow the importation of such reprints into other Colonies, and also to allow their importation into the United Kingdom when they were imported by the owners in the United Kingdom of the copyrights, or by persons authorized by those owners. The main object of the Bill was to prevent the importation into Canada of pirated editions of English copyrights.

Amendment made, in page 2, line 17, leave out from ("Bill") to the end of the clause, and insert—

"It shall be unlawful for any person, not being the owner, in the United Kingdom, of the copyright in such book, or some person authorised by him, to import into the United Kingdom any copies of such book reprinted or re-published in Canada: and for the purposes of such importation the seventeenth section of the said Act of the fifth and sixth years of the reign of Her Majesty, chapter forty-five, shall apply to all such books in the same manner as if they had been reprinted out of the British dominions."

Then it was moved to insert the following clause:—

"The said Order in Council, dated the seventh day of July one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, shall continue in force so far as relates to books which are not entitled to copyright for the time being, in pursuance of the said reserved Bill."

Clause agreed to.

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 179.)

AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 158.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on the said Bill, read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, he wished to say a few words about the Bill before the House went into Committee. It dealt with a subject of considerable importance, and a Bill dealing with it had been twice before their Lordships before; the first time, two years ago, when his noble and learned Friend (Lord O'Hagan) brought in a Government measure to deal with it; and the second time last year, when he himself, at the instance of the General Synod of the Irish Church, had, as a private Member, brought in a

Bill. His own Bill last year provided that the originals of the registers of births, marriages, and deaths, should be taken to Dublin and placed in the custody of the Master of the Rolls, whilst certified copies should be made, and sent down to the parishes, where they would be accessible to persons in the localities. It also provided for the compensation of clergymen who would be deprived of fees by the removal of these records from their custody out of the funds of the late Established Church; and this he thought was the rock upon which the Bill had split, for it was owing to the objections of the Government to this part of the measure that it was not persevered with. The present Bill, on the other hand, whilst it provided, as he understood it, that the legal custody of all registers of births, marriages, deaths, and ordinations should be in the Master of the Rolls, left the actual custody of those belonging to parishes whose present incumbents had had charge of them before the passing of the Irish Church Act with those incumbents, until they either died or left the parishes they were in at the time that Act passed. After either of these two events should have happened they were to be sent to the Rolls Office in Dublin, and persons who wished to make searches would have either to go to Dublin, or to employ someone in Dublin to do so for them. He supposed the object of this was to avoid the necessity of compensating the clergymen; but it did not leave the books for the present any safer than they were before. The Bill further provided that where entries had been made in books since the Church Act passed, the Master of the Rolls might make an order for them to be left for an unspecified time—but he supposed until they were finished—with new incumbents, who were to be bound to take care of them. There did not appear, however, to be any method provided by the Bill for enforcing the obligation. He was much obliged to his noble and learned Friend for bringing in this measure; but he had thought it well, in the interests of the persons affected by it, to call attention to the different method, from that of last year, now proposed of dealing with these records, which had been hitherto very liable to be injured or destroyed. He did not mean to move any Amendments, as he had no doubt that the matter had been carefully considered, and that there was some good reason for what was to be done.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the matter had been found to be one of considerable difficulty, and the method proposed by this Bill differed from that proposed by one, if not by both, of the two former Bills. The Bill brought in by his noble Friend (the Earl of Belmore) last year provided that the original records should be taken up to Dublin, and kept there, and that copies should be made of them and sent down to the parishes. There were, however, several thousand volumes of these books; he could not at the moment say how many. To copy them all would take several years and involve great expense, and when done they would be sure to be full of inaccuracies, so much so that no one would be satisfied with them, but would in case of a search insist on consulting the original volumes. It was thought only fair that those incumbents who had charge of them up to 1870 should continue to do so, until they either died or left the incumbencies they then held. In the case of unfinished books the Master of the Rolls might make a special order to leave any of them with an incumbent appointed since that date, until the book was finished, security being taken he would take care of it; and it was thought to be not unreasonable to impose this duty upon him. He was glad to find that his noble Friend did not intend to propose any Amendments.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

RAILWAYS—LADIES' COMPARTMENTS. QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, if under existing Acts of Parliament the Government have power to compel Railway Companies to set aside one or more compartments in each train for the exclusive use of ladies travelling alone, there is any power on the part of the Railway authorities to compel ladies travelling alone to occupy those compartments in preference to others?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, no Act of Parliament enables the Board of Trade to compel railway companies to set aside compartments for the exclusive use of ladies travelling alone. I hope the Board of Trade will never have such regulations between companies and the public in their hands on the part of the Government. The Board of Trade can approve by-laws, but not impose them. Most of the companies have such a regulation, and do set apart compartments for ladies. But, as the noble Lord's very natural Question suggests, they cannot compel ladies to use them. I am not sure that it is not as requisite that compartments should be set aside for men into which women should not be admitted.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. W. HOLMS asked the Lord Advocate, If he proposes to introduce a Bill this Session to consolidate and amend the Acts referring to Public Health in Scotland, on the same basis as the Bill entitled "The Public Health Act, 1875," now before the Legislature; and, in particular, if he proposes to include a provision for enabling local authorities in Scotland to borrow money from the Public Works Loan Commissioners for sanitary purposes, at as low a rate of interest as has been conceded in regard to loans to local authorities in England?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: In 1867 I introduced a Bill into this House for the purpose of consolidating the laws relating to public health in Scotland. That Bill passed into law, and has been in operation since that time, and has given considerable satisfaction in its working. Therefore, it is quite unnecessary to proceed in the way of consolidating those laws, though it was my intention at one time to introduce a Bill for the purpose of making some amendments with a view to improve the Act. The state of Public Business, however, has prevented me from doing so. At the same time, I am glad to say that I have the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he will consent to my introducing a Bill to enable money to be borrowed in Scotland from the Public Works Loan Commissioners for sanitary purposes, the same as is done in England and Ireland. As this privilege has been granted to the other two kingdoms, I do not apprehend that its extension to Scotland will give rise to much discussion.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. LOWE rose to call attention to the position of the Civilians in the North-West Provinces of India; and to move for a Select Committee to inquire and report upon the Memorial of members of Her Majesty's Civil Service in India to the Secretary of State for India in 1873, and on the Correspondence relating to such Memorial laid before the House. The right hon. Gentleman said, he rose for the purpose of calling attention to what he believed to be the grievous wrong which was sustained by a portion of the Civil Service in India. For that wrong no remedy could be obtained except by appealing to the House of Commons. This grievance was an old one. As soon as the English Government obtained a secure footing in India by the overthrow of the Native Princes, adventurers went out from this country armed with letters from persons of influence here, recommending them for situations and employment. In the last speech delivered in that House by Lord Macaulay, he told a characteristic story of Lord Clive, who, when one of these young men came out with a letter of recommendation, being evidently unfit for employment, remarked to him in his peculiar way—"Well, chap, what do you want to be off?" And, in fact, large sums of money often used to be given to these young men out of the revenues of India to induce them to return to England. Ultimately a close service was established for India; but it was thought better that the patronage should be dispensed in England rather than in India, because there would be greater responsibility. This was the system existing up to 1853, when Parliament determined to maintain the close service in India, but to alter the conditions on which appointments should be made. Instead of men getting these situations by patronage, they were to be appointed to them after competition; but when they were once so appointed the close service was to be retained, and that was the principle of the Act of 1853. In a speech delivered by Lord Macaulay on June 24, 1853, he pointed out that some gentleman of great ability thought that the best mode of improving the government of India would be by throwing open the Service, and remarked that it seemed plausible to propose that the Governor General should choose his own servants; but he prophesied that the destruction of the old mode would lead to a system of great abuse in the distribution of patronage; instead of purity, there would be a return to the old traffic in appointment by letters of recommendation, which would be treated as Bills of Exchange drawn upon the revenues of India in return for Parliamentary support given in that House. In 1793 an Act was passed providing that vacancies in any office under the degree of Councillor should be filled up from the Civil Service belonging to the Presidency in which the vacancy occurred. This was the charter of the Indian Civil Service. When the change took place in 1853, he (Mr. Lowe) filled the office of Secretary to the Board of Control, and it devolved upon him, Lord Halifax then being at the head of the Department, to bring the new regulations into effect. Therefore, the members of the Civil Service in the North-West Provinces came to him to ask him to state their grievances. Up to 1857 things went on prosperously. In the year 1857 the Civil Service Commissioners addressed to the Government of India a communication stating how little was known in this country of the great advantages to be derived from taking a place in the Indian Civil Service, and they desired to have information as to the offices and salaries with a view to stimulating competition for these appointments. The Government of India complied with this request. In an official letter Mr. Melville gave the information which was asked for, and it was put before the public by the Civil Service Commissioners in the most formal manner on behalf of the Government of India. This had a great effect in inducing young men to become competitors for places in the Indian Civil Service. His noble Friend the Under Secretary for India had, doubtless, been instructed by the Government to deny that there had been any breach of faith in this matter at all. He thought it was clear, however, that if the Government of India instructed the Civil Service Commissioners to make statements in order to induce young men to offer themselves for the Civil Service of India, although it was not bound in all circumstances to see that the statements were fulfilled was certainly bound to act fairly towards those men, and to do nothing wilfully which would diminish the advantages it had promised to them. All he maintained was, not that the Government of India was bound to do anything beyond what it undertook to do, but that it ought not wilfully to take away the advantages it had promised. If it should appear that it had taken away those advantages, then, he maintained, it had committed a breach of faith. But he had also to rely on the Act of Parliament he had already quoted, and he would show the House that that statute had been repeatedly violated. He might further rely on the interest of the Government in this matter. Who could suppose that any enlightened or civilized Government would take the greatest trouble in order to gather from all quarters the ablest young men to be found in this country, that it would train them at great expense for two years in England and for two years more in India, and that after all it should place over their heads persons who had gone through no such test? The decline of the system began in 1861, when an Act was passed enabling the Indian Government, with certain very stringent safeguards, as they were considered to be, to appoint persons other than civil servants to offices previously appropriated to members of the Civil Service of India.

No doubt, the Act was passed with the best intentions, and was partly justified by the great pressure caused by the number of vacancies which resulted from the deaths occurring during the Indian Mutiny, and the further pressure brought about by the increase of our territory. He did not want to exaggerate or overstate anything, and he admitted that this Act had not been very freely used. But if things went on as they were at present doing, it would come about that the Act would be much more freely used. He thought the Act was to be extremely regretted, because it was in some degree a breaking of faith with those persons who had gone out to India on the faith of the Act of 1853. Protests were made when this Act passed by members of the Council in India, which clearly showed their opinion of the extreme danger of breaking down the close system in India. Mr. Mangles and Lord Lawrence were two of those who so protested. There was besides another Act passed in 1870 which threw open to Natives certain offices which were formerly tenable only by members of the Civil Service. Of course, no one could object to Natives being appointed to posts for which they were fitted; but this was nevertheless a breach of faith to those members of the Civil Service who went out on the faith of the previous statute and the declarations he had referred to. There was on the part of the Indian Government a distinct duty, which, if assumed by an individual, any Court of Law would have forced him to perform. There was no Court of Law before which this case could be tried. These people had no refuge but the sense of justice of the House of Commons, and to that sense of justice he appealed. He would confine his remarks to the civilians who were in the North-Western Provinces. There were regulation and non-regulation Provinces. The regulation Provinces were Madras, Bombay, Lower Bengal, and the North-Western Provinces—the non-regulation Provinces were Oude, the Punjab, Burmah, and the Central Provinces. Lord Dalhousie made, in 1856, some resolutions in the case of the North-Western Provinces. These resolutions were, in fact, decrees binding on the Government of India, and they were to the effect that the Punjab and Oude should be served by civilians of the North-Western Provinces. Lord Dalhousie also made a regulation that at least one-half of the persons employed in the offices of these two non-regulation Provinces, Oude and the Punjab, should be civil servants. That regulation was laid down in 1856, but from that time to the present it had never been observed. In 1867 Lord Lawrence, then Governor General of India, went further than Lord Dalhousie, for he laid down by resolution that the civilians should have two-thirds of the situations in the non-regulation Provinces. As, however, they never obtained one-half of the situations, of course they never obtained two-thirds. The Civil Service in the North-Western Provinces was reduced by the means he had described to a condition which was perfectly miserable, as compared with what the civil servants there had a right to expect. That was the charge he had to bring against the Indian Government, that they had broken faith by not preserving their own regulations which were still in force, and had continued to draw persons from England by competition just as if they had not filled up the places by other means. That charge the Government themselves admitted in so many words. Why was it that the resolutions of Lord Dalhousie and Lord Lawrence had not been adhered to? The reason was only too simple. The Indian Government had taken military men, and had placed them in the Civil Service to the exclusion of those for whom that service was supposed to be reserved. The result was that it was overcrowded. That was not all. These gentlemen having been put into a service where they had no right to be, and having interest, and being well befriended, rose rapidly in the service, and were put over the heads of civilians who were better qualified, but who had no interest, and who were not influentially befriended. These military men filled all the best posts of the Civil Service in the provinces he had mentioned, and the civilians were kept in the lowest grades. So that what they had got was a service officered greatly by men who had gone through no competition and given no proof of fitness, and they had the very pick and flower of English youth serving under them in comparatively insignificant situations. If he were able to call a Committee and to establish this case, was there any man in that House who would tell him that a case of breach of faith of the greatest character had not been established? In 1857, when the Papers he had alluded to were published by the Civil Service Commissioners in order to induce persons to compete, the number of Bengal civil servants was 392, and of these only 134 drew less than £1,000 a-year. In 1874 there were 526 civil servants in Bengal, of whom 234 drew less than £1,000 a-year. Thus almost the whole of the total increase of the service during that period was in the lowest grade of all. This fact in itself spoke volumes. In 1862 the civilians in the North-West Provinces who had completed eight years' service drew £1,020 a-year; in 1872 they only received £600. In 1862, after 12 years' service, they drew £1,630; in 1872 only £800, or less than half. It was admitted by the Government of India that the remuneration of those persons had fallen below that which it was held out to them they would receive to the extent of one-half, and yet he was told there had been no breach of faith, and that they had made out no case for compensation. If provinces had been cut off from our Indian Empire so that there was a glut of civil servants, he should not be indisposed to say that the civil servants must bear their share in the national calamity; but for the Government of these provinces to select their own friends and relations and connections, and put them into those places which had been solemnly promised to the civil servants, thus reducing the salaries of the latter one-half, and keeping them in a subordinate position, seemed to him contrary to every principle of justice. In Madras when a civilian received £920 a-year in the North-West Provinces he received only £600, and when one in Madras received £1,920 a-year in the North-West Provinces he received only £900. But in the case of Madras there was comparatively no jobbing. He would now call attention to the Petition before the House, because it was necessary that the House should see the complaints which had been brought to the notice of the Government of India, and the answer which the Government had given to them. He would be very glad to submit this Petition to a Committee of the House, but the Government had decided not to grant one. Here were some of the instances of military and uncovenanted men obtaining appointments in the Civil Service, to the exclusion of covenanted civilians. First there was Major James, a major of a Cavalry regiment, who had never done any civil work in his life. In 1870 Major James was appointed to be the chief civil magistrate of a district. The appointment was believed to have been made against his own wish, because his military appointment was wanted for someone else. Major James was so absolutely ignorant of civil work that he had to be placed for six weeks under another magistrate to learn it, and was then declared qualified to award sentences of seven years' imprisonment, though a civilian had two years' training in England and two years' more in India before he was allowed to award more than six months. At the time Major James was appointed there were covenanted civilians of 10 and 11 years' standing in the same Province in lower grades. The next case was that of Mr. Kiernander. He was an uncovenanted assistant in the Financial Department, and was gazetted in the order of the Government of India, Financial Department, dated the 16th of April, 1875, "to take charge of the office of Accountant General of Punjab." That was one of the offices specially reserved for covenanted civilians by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 54, s. 2, and the Government of India evaded the law by gazetting a man "to be in charge of the office of Accountant General," instead of to be Accountant General, although he drew the full pay and performed all the duties. They had now ceased to appoint young civilians to the Financial Department of the Treasury, and they held a sham competition in India of three or four nominees, who were often rejected candidates for the Civil Service. The third case was that of Mr. Kempsen, Director of Public Instruction, North-West Provinces. Mr. Kempsen went out in 1857 as an under-master in Mr. Madoek's school at Mussoorie; he was a great cricketer and attracted the Lieutenant Governor's attention, who appointed him Inspector of Schools at £1,200 a-year about 1860, and in 1862 Director of Public Instruction, the highest appointment in the Educational Department, and one which had always been held by a civilian up to that time.

The pay was £3,000 a-year, and civilians of the same standing as Mr. Kempsen (15 years) were only receiving an average of £1,200 a-year in the same Province. The right hon. Gentleman also cited similar cases of Mr. R. A. Lloyd, Mr. J. C. Macdonald, Mr. H. W. Gibson, Mr. H. H. Butts, and Mr. P. J. White, as specimens of the kind of thing which was going on in India, and as instances which showed that the men put in by interest not only absorbed the appointments intended for civilians, but got pushed on more rapidly, and drew more pay than their civilian contemporaries who were better trained, and were, therefore, presumably more efficient. A memorial had been laid on the Table of the House on his Motion, together with the Petition of the civilians of the North-West Provinces to the Duke of Argyll, then Secretary of State for India. In that memorial the civilians set forth Lord Dalhousie's rules, confirmed by Lord Halifax in 1864, and re-affirmed by Lord Lawrence in 1867. They also set out the Petition presented by them to the Governor General in 1872. The answer of the Governor General was very remarkable. It was to the effect that any relief he could give to the service by appointments in his gift would be small, while in every appointment the fitness of the individual must be more considered than the claims of the service at large, however urgent they might be. But surely in such appointments as that of Major James the fitness of the individual was not regarded at all. He held in his hand a conclusive proof of the misconduct of the Indian Government, and particularly of the departmental Governments in this matter. It was the answer of the Government of India, dated Simla, 30th of October, 1873, and addressed to the Duke of Argyll, then Secretary of State. In that paper, speaking of the memorial of the civilians of the North-West Provinces, which they were transmitting, they say—"The contention of the memorialists is, in the main, borne out by facts." They introduced the qualifying words "in the main;" but, in reality, these words should have been struck out, because there was not even an attempt to show that these unfortunate young men had in any way exaggerated the treatment to which they had been subjected. The Indian Government went on to say that—"There was not, in fact, under the North-Western Provinces Government a sufficient number of the higher appointments to furnish reasonable promotion in due course of seniority for the increased number of gentlemen who had been sent out and posted to the Provinces. The pressure was mainly caused by an over supply about the years 1861-63."

No; but it was caused by jobbery. Why were there no appointments for the unfortunate persons who had been brought out to India relying on the pledge that promotion would follow upon length of service? Because the Government of India had taken the appointments away and given them to relatives and friends. This was cruel and unfair treatment, and went beyond what was to be expected from any Government. He had long held high office, and he could say that if a Chancellor of the Exchequer were to do any such thing in England, he could not retain his place for a week. But although these things were done in India, the gentlemen affected by them were as much entitled to justice as if they were here. This House was properly no respecter of persons, and no matter if those men were the poorest in the land it would wish that justice should be done them. He held in his hand a list of the successful candidates who had entered the Indian Civil Service from 1855 to 1863, and they amounted to 414. Of these, 98 came from Oxford, 76 from Cambridge, 70 from Dublin, 38 from the University of London, 28 from the Queen's University, 25 from Edinburgh, 15 from Aberdeen, 3 from Melbourne, 1 from Calcutta, and the rest from various public schools and Colleges. Now, it was surely something rather hard that one should have to plead, not for any extraordinary favour or consideration for those gentlemen, but that justice should be done them. If they could get into a Court of Law it would be awarded to them as a matter of course, and yet they were told by the Government that they could do nothing to remedy an evil so monstrous as this. Then came the last paragraph of the letter of the Indian Government. It was—

"It is true, however, that the promotion of many of the memorialists has been and will be materially delayed, mainly through non-observance in past years of the rules for distributing appointments in the non-regulation Provinces to covenanted civilians."

Here we had got the admission from the

Government that it was not from necessity, but merely from a violation of the rules that these men had not obtained the promotion to which they were entitled. Then we had got something about expediency, for the letter went on to say—

"And the condition of the Civil Service is connected with its efficiency quite nearly enough to render this a question of general administrative importance, although it may not be one to which local Governments always look closely and consistently in dispensing their patronage."

Here we had then most complete admission that the rules had been broken, and that it had been done through the misconduct of the local Governments. The only wonderful thing was that when the Government of India made such an admission it did not strike them that if they did not intend to do anything they were very foolish to make it. In 1873 they meant to do something else; they proposed this remedy—

"We intend, therefore, to arrange with the different Administrations a systematic rule of procedure, whereby the preferential claims of civilians shall be brought forward and considered by the Government of India whenever an office falls vacant for which civilians are eligible, and to which no other officer has his superior claim by reason of seniority, local standing, or special qualification."

That was to say, if no excuse could be found for not appointing a civilian, they would appoint one. But nothing had been done since 1873. This proposal was a clear and distinct admission on behalf of the Indian Government that they had broken their own regulations, and had not the least intention of recompensing those whom they had injured. The proof of it was that this was dated the 30th of October, 1873. He had asked the Under Secretary of State what steps had been taken to give effect to this undertaking, and the answer was that he had no information of any steps having been taken. The Secretary of State, in a letter dated the 5th of February, 1874, said—

"I consider that the memorialists have great reason for complaint, and I must desire that the various Governments and Administrations be distinctly informed that I fully approve of the instructions which, as set forth in the fourth paragraph of the despatch under reply, your Excellency in Council proposes to issue; and I must insist that they be carefully acted on in future."

These were the instructions that nobody could be found to attack. This was the case he had had to lay before the House; and he would ask the Government to put themselves for a moment in the place of those on whose behalf he spoke. He ventured to say that there would be no great difficulty in remedying this matter, although the question of the compensation must resolve itself into a question of money in some form or other, and with the experience which had been gained the Government would do wisely to get rid of the distinction between regulation and non-regulation Provinces, at least as far as the matter of patronage was concerned. The injustice that had been done was this—Promising young men had been tempted into a competition by the hopes of early independence and retirement. They had been tempted to take a step which was irrevocable, for when a man had been many years in India it was too late to retrace his steps. Looking at the matter from a moral point of view, there was no stronger obligation on a Government, when it had offered to young men the inducement of an independent career, than to fulfil to the letter everything it had promised to do. Look at the waste that was involved in the present course of procedure. We took the best young men we could find, who had been trained at an enormous expense; we sent them out to India, and we set them to discharge, under others who had undergone no test whatever, the duties of clerks, which could very well be performed by men who had not been so thoroughly educated at home. The government of 250,000,000 people of India by a few whites of an alien race was a feat such as the world never saw; and how a Government could neglect any opportunity of governing by the best instruments they could employ he could not imagine. The conduct that was complained of must re-act unfavourably on the class from whom these recruits came. After the exposure of to-day, could he expect that the same class of young men would enter into these competitions? Look at the danger this system exposed us to. We drove these young men into despair by keeping them in poverty, in an unhealthy climate, in a country where all who approached them were ready to bribe them; and thus, so far from inculcating loyalty to the Government, we taught them to regard the Government as an enemy. We took them to India under false pretences, and broke our plighted word in a manner unknown under any other civilized Government. Look also at the cruelty of the thing. In one case a man who had succeeded in the competition went out to India on the faith of these assurances, mainly because he was anxious to marry. He married, children came quickly, and he was one of those to whom this system was applied in all its rigour. Although extremely careful and economical, he was reduced to such poverty that he actually had to petition the Government to grant him a compassionate allowance to enable him to educate his children. He did not say the present Government was, in any way, to blame; the blame rested with former Governments; and he hoped that no false feeling of chivalry for their Predecessors would cause any hesitation on the part of the present Government to abolish, in taking steps to free us from the scandal that neither the Courts of Law, nor the Indian Government, nor the English Government, nor the House of Commons had found a remedy for, so gross and patent an injustice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report upon the Memorial of members of Her Majesty's Civil Service in India to the Secretary of State for India in 1873, and on the Correspondence relating to such Memorial now laid before the House,"—(Mr. Lowe),—instead thereof.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that there was no one whose opinion on a question affecting the Indian Civil Service was more entitled to respect than that of the right hon. Gentleman, who, he was sure, did not bring this question forward with the view of embarrassing the Government, but because he considered it affected the efficiency of a Service whose interests were very dear to him. He had listened with great attention to the representation made, and he would state what were the points on which the Secretary of State could agree with the right hon. Gentleman. There ought to be no infringement of any agreement made with the Cove-nanted Civil Servants of India, and even if the Governor General or the Secretary of State wished to make an inroad on their rights they could not do it, because they were defined by Act of Parliament. No encouragement had been given, or would be given, by the India Office to those who went out to India on speculation, on the mere chance of obtaining occupation; but no doubt from time to time officers were appointed by the Secretary of State who did not belong to the Civil Service of India—such as officers who performed duties for the Public Works and Education Departments. It had always been understood by Parliament, and certainly by the Indian Civil Service, that there were certain classes of appointments to which the members of that service were not absolutely entitled. The complaint now made was a complaint against the local Governments, and not against the Supreme Government. The patronage of the Indian Government in the non-regulation Provinces was very small; and the present charges were almost exclusively directed against the Lieutenant Governors of the North-West Provinces and of the Punjab. The right hon. Gentleman spoke at length of a “breach of faith;” but he was rather astonished to find that breach of faith contained in two Acts of Parliament of the dates of 1861 and 1870, and it seemed to be a dangerous thing for any Member, more particularly for an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, to lay down positively that an Act passed 14 years ago, and that not a retrospective one, involved a breach of faith. The Act laid down clearly and distinctly what were to be the rights of Indian civil servants. The right hon. Gentleman read certain extracts containing a strong condemnation of what he thought was the Act passed in 1861; but it was not the Act of 1861. Sir Charles Wood made a draft of a Bill in 1860; there was no doubt that in that draft he proposed to curtail the rights of Indian civil servants. There was great opposition to that draft Bill, which was therefore altered, and the Bill of 1861 differed so materially from that submitted by Sir Charles Wood to the Council of India in 1860 that two of the dissentients then said—“Our dissents do not apply to the Bill now before Parliament, which contains provisions which reconcile us to the measure.” The controversy, therefore, was supposed to have been terminated by the Act of 1861; and if the right hon. Gentleman objected to the Act it was quite open to him to bring in a Bill to repeal it; but so long as it existed it was not in the power of the Governor General or the Secretary of State to disregard its provisions. The right hon. Gentleman accused the Government of a breach of faith because they had not complied with the inducements offered in what might be called the “prospectus” of the Civil Service Commissioners. But nothing was said in their Report of 1859 about the intervals which must usually elapse between successive promotions. No promotion was guaranteed by them, nor could it be. Even the right hon. Gentleman himself could hardly lay down the principle on which promotion proceeded—whether by seniority or selection. Mr. Mangles, one of the Council, had, in a Minute written against the proposals of Sir Charles Wood, fallen into the error of assuming that promotion was guaranteed to Indian civil servants by the Civil Service Commissioners in 1859. In the Memorial, quoted from by the right hon. Gentleman, that part of Mr. Mangles’s Minute which was incorrect had been inserted as if it were part of the Report of the Civil Service Commission. Anyone reading that Memorial would at once assume that certain promises, as regarded promotion, made in specific language by the Civil Service Commission, had been disregarded by the Indian Government. No promises were made, and Mr. Mangles was wrong in asserting that they had been made. By engraving Mr. Mangles’s error in their recent Memorial in such a way as to make his words appear to be those of the Civil Service Commissioners, the memorialists had misled the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. LOWE said, he did not maintain that promotion was guaranteed. All he said was that the Government guaranteed these civil servants against the result of the acts of the Government itself.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the only specific instance of breach of faith cited by the right hon. Gentleman was in the North-West Provinces. Now, he could not deny that the Indian Government admitted that the contention of those memorialists was, in the main, borne out. They said that the promo-

for the right hon. Gentleman to denounce, in strong language, this breach of faith when such concessions had been made by the Indian Government. It was admitted that the Bengal civil servants, who could not complain of any breach of faith, were in quite as hopeless a state respecting promotion as the civil servants of the North-Western Provinces. Was their case to be considered? Was that of the Madras civil servants to be considered? A precedent of a most dangerous character was set by such a Motion. The Indian Civil Service was, perhaps, the strongest and best employed by any Government in the world, and its members were quite able to take care of themselves through their friends in Parliament. Upon what principle was compensation to be given if this demand were granted? If promotion depended on selection, how could you prove that a man was entitled to compensation owing to a want of promotion? The right hon. Gentleman said the Indian Civil Service was the grandest administrative machine in the world. This statement was quite true, and why? Because every individual engaged in this service knew that after his first appointment his promotion would depend upon merit. If the House once interfered with the power of selection by local Governors, how could they be held responsible for the maintenance of order in their respective Provinces? Was the right hon. Gentleman of opinion that successive Lieutenant Governors had been guilty of jobbery? Then he should move a vote of censure upon them. It might be possible that here and there Lieutenant Governors had not always discreetly exercised their power of selection. But he hoped that the House would not, on account of some few unwise appointments, lay down hard-and-fast rules which would prevent Lieutenant Governors from exercising the most salutary right of choosing those who were to serve under them. The right hon. Gentleman complained of the appointment of so many military officers. It must be remembered that some of our ablest administrators and political officers—Sir James Outram, Sir Henry Lawrence, Sir Henry Durand, Sir Thomas Munro, and Sir Henry Edwards—had served in the Army. He trusted that the House would seriously consider the objections to the proposal of the right

hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London before assenting to it. The subject was under the consideration of the Indian Government, and he believed the reason of the delay which had occurred was, not because they did not want to consider the question at all, but because it was a question of great difficulty. He did not see how the subject could be satisfactorily dealt with by a Committee. Who were to be placed upon such a Committee? What information was to be given to it? Who was to supply this information? Were the Lieutenant Governors to be called home to give evidence? And if no representatives of the local Government appeared before the Committee, the inquiry would be a one-sided one. In the earlier part of the Session the right hon. Gentleman had been satirical on the Government for endeavouring to carry on the Business of the country by Select Committees; but if there was one question more than another over which the Government ought to have absolute control it was surely that which related to the appointment of those whose services it employed. If it could be shown that the Indian Government had disregarded the Petitions which had been addressed to them, and had not endeavoured to redress the grievances complained of, there might be some reason for appointing a Committee. But while the Indian Government had refused to grant pecuniary compensation, they had made great concessions; and it would be a strong measure to take the inquiry out of their hands upon what he might, without offence, call the ad captandum appeal of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was one of the Lieutenant Governors who were in some measure incriminated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). He therefore wished to say that during his administration of Bengal he attempted to follow very much the lines indicated by the right hon. Gentleman, by placing the civil servants in the appointments to which reference was made. The consequence was that he had been enormously abused. He was attacked at the bar of the Government of India, and he had some difficulty in defending himself. He was inclined to think, on the one hand, that the right hon. Gentleman had gone somewhat too far and made out too strong a case; while, on non-regulation Provinces. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman could not on their behalf urge the same argument as he had on behalf of the covenanted servants of the North-Western Provinces. If the right hon. Gentleman looked at the memorial he would find it stated that many of the junior civilians in the Province of Bengal were in the same hopeless position as those in the North-West Provinces. Therefore, it was perfectly clear that what was complained of was not the result of ignoring regulations, nor the consequence of any breach of faith.

[The House was here summoned by Black Rod to attend in the House of Lords: on their return—]

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON continued: When interrupted he was calling attention to the fact that Indian civil servants had no rights guaranteed in the non-regulation Provinces; their rights were strictly defined by Act of Parliament. There could be no question that the civil servants of the North-West Provinces did occupy an exceptional position as regarded the non-regulation Provinces, inasmuch as a regulation was made as to the proportion in which appointments in non-regulation Provinces were to be held by covenanted servants of the North-West Provinces. There was no question that the candidates for appointments in the North-West Provinces had assumed that half the appointments in the non-regulation Provinces would be held by civil servants. Admitting that fact, which had been already admitted by the Government of India, he was not prepared to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into this matter. The question had been before the Government of India for nearly five years; they had made great concessions to the covenanted service; they had altered the rules relating to leave and to furlough; they had made every concession except that of giving compensation; and the proposal of the memorialists amounted to a request for pecuniary compensation. If, therefore, the appointment of a Committee was granted, the only question the Committee would consider would be what amount of compensation was to be given to the civil servants who complained; and compensation could be given in two ways, either by increasing the pay of their present appointments, or by making fresh appointments, conferring upon their holders higher pay. Either scheme would be equally objectionable both as a precedent and as throwing fresh charges upon the revenues of India. Soon after he accepted his present office he was told in that House by one of more experience that nine out of ten of the Motions on Indian matters were made solely with the object of squeezing something out of the Indian Government. If, however, an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer attacked the Indian revenues in this House, he feared that he should have no chance whatever of successfully defending these revenues. The right hon. Gentleman said there had been a breach of faith towards these civil servants. Suppose his assertion were put to this test, and the Committee were granted upon condition that all the concessions made to them in respect of pensions and furloughs were given up in return for the increase of pay now asked for. He felt sure that the civil servants who now put forward this grievance would not agree to such a condition. Two years ago the Indian Government had made an immense concession in the matter of pensions, the result being to impose an additional charge of £70,000 a-year upon the revenues of India, and to give a civil servant who had served 25 years, including four years' furlough, a pension of £1,000 quite irrespective of the amount of his yearly contribution towards buying the annuity. This concession was peculiarly applicable to the present complainants. Slow promotion, under the old pension rules, affected a civil servant in two different ways—his annual salary was less, and, as a necessary consequence, his pension was less, inasmuch as his pension materially depended upon the 4 per cent annual deductions made from his salary. Now, however, anyone could retire upon the highest pension irrespective of the amount of his contributions towards purchasing his pension. Any loss these gentlemen had sustained in consequence of a want of promotion might be debited against the advantage they would gain under the new pension rules, and if that were done he believed the Indian Exchequer would be found not the better, but the worse for the change. At all events, it was hardly fair

for the right hon. Gentleman to denounce, in strong language, this breach of faith when such concessions had been made by the Indian Government. It was admitted that the Bengal civil servants, who could not complain of any breach of faith, were in quite as hopeless a state respecting promotion as the civil servants of the North-Western Provinces. Was their case to be considered? Was that of the Madras civil servants to be considered? A precedent of a most dangerous character was set by such a Motion. The Indian Civil Service was, perhaps, the strongest and best employed by any Government in the world, and its members were quite able to take care of themselves through their friends in Parliament. Upon what principle was compensation to be given if this demand were granted? If promotion depended on selection, how could you prove that a man was entitled to compensation owing to a want of promotion? The right hon. Gentleman said the Indian Civil Service was the grandest administrative machine in the world. This statement was quite true, and why? Because every individual engaged in this service knew that after his first appointment his promotion would depend upon merit. If the House once interfered with the power of selection by local Governors, how could they be held responsible for the maintenance of order in their respective Provinces? Was the right hon. Gentleman of opinion that successive Lieutenant Governors had been guilty of jobbery? Then he should move a vote of censure upon them. It might be possible that here and there Lieutenant Governors had not always discreetly exercised their power of selection. But he hoped that the House would not, on account of some few unwise appointments, lay down hard-and-fast rules which would prevent Lieutenant Governors from exercising the most salutary right of choosing those who were to serve under them. The right hon. Gentleman complained of the appointment of so many military officers. It must be remembered that some of our ablest administrators and political officers—Sir James Outram, Sir Henry Lawrence, Sir Henry Durand, Sir Thomas Munro, and Sir Henry Edwardes—had served in the Army. He trusted that the House would seriously consider the objections to the proposal of the right

hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London before assenting to it. The subject was under the consideration of the Indian Government, and he believed the reason of the delay which had occurred was, not because they did not want to consider the question at all, but because it was a question of great difficulty. He did not see how the subject could be satisfactorily dealt with by a Committee. Who were to be placed upon such a Committee? What information was to be given to it? Who was to supply this information? Were the Lieutenant Governors to be called home to give evidence? And if no representatives of the local Government appeared before the Committee, the inquiry would be a one-sided one. In the earlier part of the Session the right hon. Gentleman had been satirical on the Government for endeavouring to carry on the Business of the country by Select Committees; but if there was one question more than another over which the Government ought to have absolute control it was surely that which related to the appointment of those whose services it employed. If it could be shown that the Indian Government had disregarded the Petitions which had been addressed to them, and had not endeavoured to redress the grievances complained of, there might be some reason for appointing a Committee. But while the Indian Government had refused to grant pecuniary compensation, they had made great concessions; and it would be a strong measure to take the inquiry out of their hands upon what he might, without offence, call the ad captandum appeal of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was one of the Lieutenant Governors who were in some measure incriminated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). He therefore wished to say that during his administration of Bengal he attempted to follow very much the lines indicated by the right hon. Gentleman, by placing the civil servants in the appointments to which reference was made. The consequence was that he had been enormously abused. He was attacked at the bar of the Government of India, and he had some difficulty in defending himself. He was inclined to think, on the one hand, that the right hon. Gentleman had gone somewhat too far and made out too strong a case; while, on the other hand, his impression was that the noble Lord who represented the India Office had made too complete a defence. He had proved too much. He altogether denied that the fault, if fault there was, lay exclusively with the local Governments, as a very large proportion of the patronage in respect of the appointments in question was exercised by the Government of India and the Viceroy. He thought the Government of India was bound to see that this patronage was exercised in accordance with the principle of the Acts which Parliament had passed upon the subject; but it was too late now to go back to consider the propriety of those Acts. With regard to the information furnished to the Civil Service Commission in 1859, there was no just ground of complaint. It was a plain statement of facts. In consequence of the Mutiny promotion was abnormally high. The civil servants in India were bound to examine the facts for themselves, and the Government were not bound to make compensation. The grievances of the civil servants, in general, were not particularly great; but he thought the case of the civil servants in the North-West Provinces had been made out. Although the promise held out by Lord Dalhousie did not amount to a regular legal guarantee, but only to a promise made in the most formal way that could be adopted—a statement published in The Gazette—they were justified in believing that the Government would follow the course indicated, and substantial grievances had been inflicted upon them, inasmuch as that course had not been followed. Now with regard to the remedy, he thought it ought not to take the shape of compensation at the expense of the taxpayers of India. The matter should be adjusted in some other way. A very broad question was involved. One half of our dominions in India were free from the regulations in question as to patronage. With regard to the older dominions a new class of appointments had been created which did not come within the rules laid down. This was a serious matter, which ought to be taken into consideration by the House, and might properly be made the subject of inquiry at some future time, for it was impossible to institute such an inquiry at this late period of the Session.

Sir George Campbell

The practical grievance of the North-West Provinces was quite as true, real, and great as it had been depicted by the right hon. Gentleman, and, no doubt, a good deal of jobbery had been mixed up with it. He believed the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in all the cases he had mentioned. But with regard to the mass of appointments in the Punjab and Oude, they had not arisen entirely from jobbery, but were rather the result of the muddle which occurred on the abolition of the Army in India; and he believed that by a little foresight and care the enormous burden which had been thrown on the taxpayers might have been avoided. A large number of officers were thrown on their hands, and it was necessary for the Government of India by hook or by crook to provide for them. A large number were provided for in civil employ in the Punjab and the North-West Provinces. Great bounties in the shape of deferred annuities were held out to them by way of compensation for their grievances, provided they served long periods. The effect of that system was that the military officers being in civil employ did not retire, they blocked the service, and it became extremely difficult to give the civilians the promotion which had been promised them. They naturally resisted the intrusion of new civilians, and the Government had not the courage to deal with the question. He hoped the grievance would be redressed without making another draft on the Indian taxpayer. A new arrangement had been made to promote the retirement of the senior military officers, and he thought the opportunity should be taken to put civilians into their places, and so do justice to them. But very stringent orders would be required. He confessed he had perpetrated a few jobs, but considering the pressure put upon him it was a wonder he did not commit a great many more. He was unable to say that anything had yet been done which would have a real and practical effect. He supported the view of the right hon. Gentleman that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the matter. He did not think the broad question could be dealt with this Session; but the practical grievance of the civil servants in the North-West Provinces might be so dealt with. The India Office was not strong enough to deal with questions of this kind. The Secretary of State himself was not strong enough to put a sufficient pressure on the Government of India and the local Governments with regard to these personal questions. In the India Office there was a disposition to treat them with a tender hand. He was not sure that a Select Committee would have all the information open to officials in India, but sufficient means of information existed in this country to warrant an inquiry into this matter, and what should be done was not necessarily to give pecuniary compensation, but that the House might know really how the matter stood, and how justice might be done at the least expense to those officers who had really suffered grievous wrongs. He should support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GIBSON said, he wished to make a very few remarks on this question. He thought that there was a decided grievance, as well as a very clearly-defined remedy. He believed that the discussion which had taken place on the subject would be beneficial to the Indian Civil Service, inasmuch as public attention had thereby been called to the matter, and civil servants in India had been shown that their interests were not lost sight of in the Imperial Parliament. The noble Lord had referred to the Act of 1861, and he seemed to think that was an answer to the claim. He did not think so. The Preamble of that Act pointed out clearly and specifically that it was in consequence of the exigencies of the public service that unqualified persons had been appointed, and it was passed to ratify those appointments, and to enable the Government of India to make similar appointments if the exigencies of the public service should render it necessary. The 5th clause was purely permissive. Although that Act passed in 1861, the Secretary of State for India in 1864 went back again to the old statement, and confirmed the rule of Lord Dalhousie in plain and precise terms. Lord Lawrence, in September, 1864, in equally plain and precise terms, showed that he considered the Act of 1861 had made no difference, and should make no difference, in the distribution of patronage. He thought, then, that the broad proposition should be accepted by the House, that the Indian civil servants had entered into a most difficult and responsible service upon an understanding which had been distinctly held out to them by the nation, and the question was, had that undertaking on the part of successive Administrations been acted upon or broken? Indian civil servants in the North-West were receiving about one-half the pay they were receiving in 1862. In Madras and Bombay the salaries averaged £1,100 per annum, and in the North-West £673. The case was put with singular clearness in a letter from "A Competitive Wallah," which appeared in The Times, and the figures embodied in that letter fully established the grievance complained of. The grievance being proved and admitted, it was the duty of the Government to find a remedy, the proposition of 1873, already quoted, being no remedy at all. It was no satisfaction to men who had families to maintain and educate to talk to them of pensions in 10 or 15 years. He did not, however, believe that a Committee, as proposed, to inquire into the matter would do much good; in fact, he was of opinion that the discussion which had taken place would do all that was necessary.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had always, in dealing with Indian matters, felt that a most difficult problem of statesmanship was the degree in which this House ought to interfere with Indian administration. On the one hand, they ought to be very careful not to embarrass themselves or the Indian Administration by interfering too much or too hastily in matters of a very delicate and special character; and, on the other hand, they had assumed a responsibility which forbade them to leave all these questions of Indian administration to be dealt with, as perhaps they were in the days of the old Company's rule, entirely by Indian authority, and subject to Indian opinion only. Ever since Her Majesty had taken upon herself the responsibility of the direct administration of affairs in India, that House had had thrown upon it the responsibility of expressing its opinion clearly and distinctly upon questions affecting that administration where it was capable of doing so. He therefore rejoiced in debates of this character on subjects as to which Indian opinion required to be fortified by the expression of English opinion. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had said he found himself subjected to great pressure and exposed to unpopularity on this question, and it was a good thing that those who were so placed should be supported by opinion in England. Because the Secretary of State and the English Government abstained from interfering in questions of patronage in India, and as the English administration had purged itself from the suspicion of jobbery, it was the duty of England to support those in India who were endeavouring to administer its affairs on principles we had adopted. He would remind the House of the cogent arguments against referring this matter to a Committee. He very much doubted whether a Committee could conduct an inquiry which would lead to a satisfactory result, and he could not help fearing such an inquiry would lead to disadvantageous results. It was very questionable whether it was wise or proper to take off any portion of the responsibility which in a matter of this sort must rest with the Government of India itself. We could not undertake to govern India from England; and in these questions of promotions and appointments there were two things to be considered. There was not only the duty they owed to those they had sent out in their service, and their obligation to treat them fairly, but there was also the important duty they owed to those whom they governed, that they should appoint proper persons to the discharge of important duties. It would be an unfortunate thing if the Government of India were to say they felt themselves hampered by the action of some Committee of the House of Commons, which was really not able to examine and study the details of the subject. That applied more particularly to some of the newer non-regulation Provinces, in which from time to time it had been necessary to employ persons with very peculiar qualifications, such as distinguished officers who had been employed in the Punjab and elsewhere. Another objection to pressing the Motion to a division was that by being compelled to resist it the Government would be made to appear as if they gave their sanction to the conduct of the Government of India to an extent which they were not prepared to do. Her Majesty's Government admitted the justice of a great deal which had been said by the right hon. Gentleman, but the matter required much further consideration. He admitted that the Minute of the Government of India pointed to an inadequate remedy and that pressure must be put upon the Government of India to take stronger measures than they had taken to redress these grievances. The discussion and the manifestation of the feeling which pervaded the House were more likely to do good and to bring about a proper settlement than would probably follow a reference to a Select Committee. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, who had made so very eloquent and taking a speech, would feel that he had done more to advance his cause by eliciting information than he would do if he were to press to a division his Motion for a Committee.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, there could be no doubt that the civilians in the North-West Provinces had sustained considerable hardship, and the House evidently were of opinion that it was the duty of the Government of India to see, that in one way or another, this hardship should be remedied. At the same time, he agreed with the noble Lord that the best method of devising a remedy would not be through a Select Committee. It was very desirable that this House should, from time to time, entertain Indian questions, and that the Indian Government and Indian authorities should see reflected through this House how English opinion was affected by what was done out there. He did not think, however, that good would come from any interference by this House in the minutest details of Indian Government. The hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell), who as Lieutenant Governor of Bengal ruled over 66,000,000 of people, had spoken of the necessity of providing for those officers whose prospects were damaged by the amalgamation of the two Armies, and he could not help remembering that the worst part of the muddle which had then occurred arose from a vote taken in a very thin House under the administration of Sir Charles Wood. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) might be well satisfied to leave the case where it now stood without dividing. The responsibility rested chiefly with the local Governments of India; and he thought that after to-day's debate both the local and the central Governments would see that, in the opinion of the House of Commons, an evil existed, and that they would be stimulated to provide a real remedy.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that the discussion had been exclusively confined to Members above the Gangway, and he thought it would be well if some other Members stated their opinions on the subject. He looked at this as a popular as well as an Indian question. Were men who entered the public service on the competitive system to be cast aside in favour of those appointed through patronage? If the competitive principle were struck at in this branch of the public service, it would be struck at in every branch. The case of the Staff College at home was exactly in point. The Queen's Regulations had been altered in favour of those who had not passed through the College, and something of the same kind had happened in India. Men who failed to pass the Civil Service examination went out as secretaries and officers, and obtained civil appointments through the private influence they possessed, thus retarding the promotion of the men who had passed this examination. He hoped that the Select Committee would be granted, and that the right hon. Gentleman would persist in forcing his Motion to a division.

LORD ELCHO said, he had been requested by gentlemen interested in Scotch education to say a few words upon the able and powerful indictment submitted by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). The University authorities in Scotland felt that young men came there on the faith of statements made by the Indian Government as to the career which was open to them, and it was manifestly unjust that those statements should not be borne out and that the promised career should be in a great degree shut. His noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton) had endeavoured to defend the apparent injustice by showing that compensating advantages had been given to these civil servants in the shape of pensions and otherwise. The argument, however, that an injustice was to be redressed in this way was not a sound one, and similar reasons were at once rejected by the Committee which inquired into the Bonus question. He would recommend the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Motion, and to be satisfied, as he well might, with the result of the debate.

MR. BUTT said, the grievance complained of was one by which the civil servants in the North-Western Provinces were placed in a much worse position than those in any other part of India, in defiance of the declaration made by Lord Dalhousie that appointments were to be given in certain specific proportions between the civil servants generally. Besides, a young man who 10 or 12 years ago, having been at the head of his class, and having been, in consequence, allowed to choose the part of India in which he would like to serve, selected the North-Western Provinces as most desirable, now found that if he had been last in his class he would have been sent to Madras and Bombay, and instead of £800 or £900 would have something like £2,000 a-year. This was a special grievance and required a special remedy.

MR. LOWE said, that considering no one but the noble Lord had risen in defence of the proceeding which he had censured, and considering also the lateness of the Session, he thought he should best consult the interests of those for whom he appeared on that occasion if he did not press his Amendment.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS — LIFE INSURANCES AND ANNUITIES.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SALT drew attention to the Act which had been passed in 1864 to empower the Post Office authorities to carry into effect a system of small insurances or annuities, showing that under it a system of deferred annuities were established, than which there could be no better means provided for enabling a man who lived by his daily labour to save money. Under that system a person could buy a small deferred annuity, the money paid in being returnable at option or at death, if before the commencement of the annuity. This was in effect a Savings Bank and a provision for old age or illness, with the advantage of convenience and of perfect security. He had watched the operation of the Act with great interest, and he had been struck by the fact that so very little use had been made of the very convenient mode of making investments which it furnished. He hoped that some consideration would be given to the question, whether greater opportunities might not be taken for rendering the system more popular? Since 1864 there had been very few applications altogether for the three classes of business—immediate annuities, deferred annuities, and life insurance. At present the number of immediate annuities in existence was about 4,000; of deferred annuities, by far the most valuable and important class, only about 300; while of life insurances about 3,600 were issued and in operation. That was a very small result after the system had been in work eight years, and considering that about 4,000 post offices were established as Savings Bank offices. Why had not the system been more successful? He thought the tables were too cumbrous for the intelligence of an ordinary man, who got his living by his daily labour. He would suggest that much simpler tables might be prepared, equally accurate with those now existing but taking periods of ten or five years. Such tables might be easily prepared. There was another point to which he would advert. The knowledge of this system was not well brought home to those most concerned, and he would suggest, if there were not insuperable objections, whether the Post Office agents and messengers themselves might not be employed in this matter. By such an agency he thought the Act might be made much more effectual.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that about three weeks ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the House that he intended during the Recess to give his attention to this subject. This was also his (Lord John Manners's) intention; and they hoped to be able to remove by legislation next year some of the defects that existed in connection with savings banks and the granting of annuities, and also to afford increased facilities in reference to these valuable national institutions. The matter was eminently worthy of the attention of the Government, and he would take care that the suggestions of his hon. Friend should receive the consideration to which they were so well entitled.

ARMY—THE ARMY RESERVE—THE AUTUMN MANŒUVRES.—QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ELCHO, before putting the Questions of which he had given Notice, said, that an important statement had been made by the Commander-in-Chief at a dinner at the Mansion House on the 12th of June. His Royal Highness said—

“ We hear a great deal about reserves, and no doubt that is a great point to be attained; but I would like to see the reserves before me. I am told—in fact I know from the position I occupy, that we have a great many reserves on paper. But I should like to see them before me; I should like to see our reserves brought out with the regiments, so that we may see whether they exist and are efficient.”

He (Lord Elcho) had heard that only 20 men of the Army Reserve had answered the invitation out of 7,000 men to whom it had been addressed. With regard to the second Question, the Autumn Manœuvres had already begun, and it was therefore out of date; but the Secretary of State might act upon it next year. It would conduce very much to accurate information as to the state of the 19,000 men at Aldershot if the House could have brigade states daily, because they gave information which could not be derived from field states. It was important to know what number of men started, and to know how many were incapable from various causes of going on with the Manœuvres, so that the House might judge of the physical efficiency of these men. The noble Lord concluded by asking the Secretary of State for War, Whether an invitation has been addressed to the men of the Army Reserve to attend the coming Manœuvres; whether in reply to this invitation very few acceptances have been received; whether the War Office purposes taking any steps to ensure the attendance of the Reserve men at the manœuvres, and thus enable His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief “ to see whether the Reserves exist and are efficient;” and, whether the coming manœuvres will be so conducted as regards the equipment and marching of the troops as to test the physical fitness of the men to endure the ordinary fatigues of active service?

COLONEL MURE said, that a state which had been issued the other day of troops engaged in the Autumn Manœuvres did not give the information which was sought. It showed the number of the men which the regiments were deficient from medical causes, but not the deficiency which occurred in consequence of the men being too young to enter upon the Manœuvres. In the Army Medical Report last issued, readers were distinctly warned not to be guided in forming an opinion as to the physical qualities of the troops employed in the Autumn Manœuvres by statistics of the health of those present, which were undoubtedly satisfactory, because the troops engaged were "picked and healthy men." These were the very words used and were very significant. In the case of regiments returned from foreign service, some of them were tolerably strong; but where the regiment was largely composed of young and weak men the elimination was so great that those who remained might be said to represent a picked body of men. He hoped that the brigade states would be supplied, and that next year they would furnish full information both as to the troops with the colours and also as to the state of the Army Reserves.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would not enter upon a discussion, but would confine himself to answering the Questions of the noble Lord. In the first place, invitations had not been addressed to the men of the Army Reserve generally, but had been addressed to three districts only. No doubt, very few had responded; but it was not correct to say that only 20 out of 7,000 had responded. The number who had responded was 114; but he could not state the exact number of the reserved men in those districts. From the answers to this invitation it appeared that many of them were in good employment and in receipt of good wages. They did not wish to attend the Autumn Manœuvres; but they were perfectly ready to respond if called out for the 12 days' training to which they were liable. He was not aware that the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief wished to find these men at the Autumn Manœuvres or at the summer drills; but he desired to know that they existed and would come forward at the proper time. He was equally anxious that the existence of these men should be ascertained. As to their efficiency there could be no doubt. It had been established to the full extent because they had been so long in the Regular Army. Whether, however, they should be brought away from their employment to take part in the operations of the Regular Army in the Autumn Manœuvres was a matter for consideration. As for the efficiency of the Manœuvres in testing physical fitness, the hon. and gallant Colonel opposite (Sir Henry Havelock) would no doubt have observed yesterday that the men were in full marching order, and he might state that to-day one of the Divisions was to march in the same order a distance of 17 or 18 miles to their encampment. When so much complaint was made about the young soldiers the noble Lord must not be too sure that it was the young soldiers who always fell out, because it was often the old soldiers who had seen considerable service. Sir Thomas Steele assured him yesterday that the young soldiers were very efficient indeed, and that they seemed to be fit for very heavy duty; and he animadverted rather strongly on the attempts which had been made to throw discredit on them. With respect to the strength of the regiments, there was a field state showing the full strength of the regiments yesterday and the number absent from them, and it would be perfectly easy to lay that statement before the House. But it was not simply by figures that a fair decision in such matters could be arrived at. It was necessary to have some amount of detail as to the causes of the men's absence. Without such data it was unfair to assume that men who might be absent from their regiments were young men unfit for duty. They must remember that men reported as unfit for duty might not actually be so. On one occasion, when a considerable number of men in a particular regiment were stated to be unfit for duty, it was discovered that a large proportion of them were fit for duty, and that of the remainder the majority were older men.

LORD ELCHO: Do not the brigade states give the necessary information?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: To a certain extent, but not in full detail; but he would see what could be done.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £360,993, to complete the sum for Stationery and Printing.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT suggested that each Department should state on its own account the amount of stationery it required, so that the House might see whether the money was fairly and properly spent.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR agreed that further information on the subject of the Vote was necessary. He wished to call attention to the inquiry over which the hon. Member for Hackney presided, in order to ascertain how far the recommendations of the Committee had been acted on. There was one suggestion which ought to be carried out, and that was a return to the old practice of keeping an account of the expenditure for stationery by each Department of the Government. It was not only the best, but, indeed, the sole mode, of exercising some influence on an expenditure which the superintendent of the Department was powerless to control. By means of comparative statements of several years, the progress of this outlay could be seen, and influence brought to bear against its progress.

MR. JOHN HOLMS said, he hoped to hear how far the Treasury had endeavoured to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee appointed to inquire as to the purchase and sale of stores in our public Departments. It was recommended by the Committee that there should be better regulations as to taking stock, and that the expenditure of each Department for stationery should be ascertained. Another recommendation of the Committee was that the statutes of the realm should be printed and published by the Stationery Department in a cheap form.

MR. W. H. SMITH stated that there had not yet been sufficient time to carry the recommendations of the Committee into effect, but he hoped the House would have the required information at its disposal next year. There had not as yet been any formal meeting of the officers engaged in the purchase of stores as suggested by the Committee; but a very able Memorandum, prepared by

Mr. Rowsell, of the Admiralty, had been issued, which would go some way towards meeting the requirements of the case. As hon. Members knew, it was impossible to impose a new duty on any Department without being called upon to provide a fresh staff; but he could assure the House that the objects which the Committee had in view were not being lost sight of. The reprinting of the statutes in a cheap form, as recommended by the Committee, was being proceeded with, and he hoped they would be issued at something less than 5s.

MR. BUTT called attention to the fact that the Imperial notices were not published in The Dublin Gazette, and suggested that it should be done in future.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was not conversant with the principles on which The Dublin Gazette was published, but he would make inquiries on the point.

MR. M'LAREN said, the cost of The Edinburgh Gazette was £213 14s. only, and the profit £2,632, and asked if the prices of the advertisements could not be reduced to the public?

MR. DILLWYN called attention to the item of £200 remuneration to two Army and two Navy officials for preparing the Army and Navy Lists, and asked why the amounts were not carried to the Army and Navy Estimates?

MR. MACDONALD asked if this was an additional sum to their ordinary salaries?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, it was placed in the Estimate because the profits of the two lists went to the Stationery Department. This was an additional payment.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £18,914 to complete the sum for the Woods, Forests, &c. Office.

MR. MELLOR called attention to the recent purchase of two houses in the City, and on their being leased on the following day to the sellers for 85 years at a rental of about 4 per cent on the purchase money.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his attention had not been called to it, but he would see to it.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £33,490, to complete the sum for Works and Public Buildings Office.

MR. DILLWYN wished for some explanation with regard to the Surveyor of Public Works. That gentleman was paid partly by salary and partly by commission, and he thought such a system highly objectionable. He should like to know what the Surveyor was actually paid, and whether it was not possible that his whole time might be devoted to the public service instead of being allowed to take private practice?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the present Government were not in any way responsible for the arrangements made with the Surveyor of Works. That gentleman was very well known in the public service, and he (Mr. W. H. Smith) believed the late Government placed the greatest confidence in him. He believed the Surveyor of Works had rendered very great assistance to every Chancellor of the Exchequer and every Prime Minister who had consulted him upon matters affecting the public interests as far as works and buildings were concerned. The present arrangement was made in 1869 by the Government of that day, after careful inquiry. The Surveyor of Works received a salary of £750, and a commission upon purchases or arrangements which he might effect on behalf of the Government of the day, which brought up the salary to the average amount of former times. His hon. Friend the Member for Swansea had given Notice of a Motion on the subject for Friday, and he (Mr. W. H. Smith) would then be prepared, if his hon. Friend wished it, to state exactly what was the amount which had been paid to the Surveyor of Works by the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, a gentleman in large private practice was able to give a great deal of valuable information to the Government with regard to property to be purchased.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked that the Papers relative to the arrangement entered into in 1869 should be laid before the House.

MR. DODDS asked the rate of commission paid.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was unable to say; but he would have a statement prepared showing the commission, and lay it on the Table of the House.

An hon. MEMBER asked for an explanation respecting the charge for repairs at Broadmoor.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Board of Works was responsible for those repairs being properly charged.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY urged that the charge for repairs ought to be included in the Vote for Broadmoor, so that the House could see what was the whole of the expenditure for Broadmoor, or at any rate there ought to be a marginal note stating the sums taken in previous Votes of the same year.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

ARMY AND NAVY EXPENDITURE (AUDIT).—RESOLUTION.

MR. JOHN HOLMS rose to move—

"That in the opinion of this House, in order to secure the due appropriation of the Army and Navy Expenditure to the purposes intended by Parliament, it is expedient that the system of independent audit which, since the passing of the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act, 1866, has been successfully applied to the Accounts of the annual Grants for the Miscellaneous Civil Services, should be extended in its leading principles, to the Grants for Military and Naval Services."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at ten minutes

COUNTY BOARDS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Butt.)

[BILL 27.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BUTT, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to transfer to elective Boards the management of a large amount of taxation which was at present under the control of the Irish Grand Juries, the exercise of which power was most anomalous. That amount was continually increasing, and in 1873 the money raised and expended by the Grand Juries amounted to £1,288,000, levied upon property of the rateable value of £10,000,000, and of the estimated value of nearly £13,000,000, and the purposes to which it was applied included, among others, the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges, the building of Court houses, the payment of prison and police expenses and the salaries of county officers. In England there was nothing whatever analogous to this state of things. The legitimate object of constituting the Grand Juries was the discharge of criminal business, and it was altogether anomalous and objectionable that a body nominated by the sheriff for that purpose should be charged with the administration of taxation. Up to the year 1836 the Grand Juries of Ireland levied taxation the same as in England. They were summoned the same as in England, and they administered and imposed their taxation in the same mode. The first and most important change was made in 1836, when the Grand Juries were required to deliberate on fiscal matters in public. This was a great advantage to the public, but other changes were made which were not so successful. The first was in the constitution of the Grand Jury, which was placed entirely under the control of the sheriff. The counties of Ireland were divided into baronies, which were somewhat similar to the hundreds in England. In the county of Cork the number of baronies were 23, while in other counties they were only seven or eight in number. In 1836 the Grand Jury were absolute, but now they were reduced to the position of a mere Court for the review of the decisions of local bodies. The sheriff had the power of selecting from the ratepayers in the baronies the names of persons who were to be on the Grand Jury, and he frequently chose those whom he knew would give a silent assent to the proceedings of the presentment sessions. That was substantially the system upon which for a long series of years the administration of £1,200,000 a-year was carried on. It was altogether an inefficient system, and the verdict was that in the whole of the levy of the taxation in Ireland there was not a shadow of personal control or representation. It was this system which he asked the

House to assist him in checking. In 1842 a Royal Commission was issued, upon which Sir William Somerville, Sir John Young, Mr. Serjeant Greene, and Mr. O'Ferrall sat. The Commissioners made a Report which contained recommendations in favour of a change. They cited instances of the mode in which the taxation was conducted, and pointed out the inefficiency of the appeals. But none of their recommendations had been carried into effect except the abolition of the office of County Treasurer. Yet it was shown that in some instances the persons chosen upon the road sessions could neither read nor write, and had no interest in the district proposed to be taxed. The same complaints were repeated before a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1868, who recommended that the associated cesspayers should be selected by the ratepayers, and that no magistrate should be allowed to sit who had not an interest in the property of the district. In 1849 the Government, by the hands of Sir George Grey, brought in a Bill appointing District Councils and County Councils as distinct from the Grand Juries. Under that Bill two-thirds were to be nominated by what was intended to be, and would have been to some extent, a popular election, and one-third only were to be selected by the magistracy. The Bill was put off to a limbo to which a great many measures were often consigned. It was deferred until the following Session, with a promise that it would then be re-introduced, but that promise was never performed. In 1855 a Bill was introduced, also establishing County Boards, pretty much on the same principle, by Sir Denham Norreys. It fell through and was introduced again by the same hon. Member in 1856, and again in 1857, and there was then an end of that attempt at legislation. The next attempt was by himself (Mr. Butt) in 1861. He moved for a Committee of Inquiry, with a view of ascertaining how far the principle of popular representation might be employed. Mr. Cardwell, who was then Chief Secretary, opposed the Motion, and invited him to bring in a Bill, but he was not charmed with the invitation, knowing what became of Bills introduced by private Members. The Motion was defeated on a division, and if the Government objected to the present measure, he invited the Chief Secretary to bring in a Bill to carry out the recommendation of the Committee of 1842. The Bill which he now asked the House to read a second time gave the ratepayers some voice in the management of the lunatic asylums, and substituted a more efficient mode of dealing with the roads of a county than at present existed. He proposed by it to adhere to the old division of barony; but where the number of baronies in a county exceeded 12, power was given by this Bill to the Lord Lieutenant in Council to consolidate them. Next, it was proposed by the Bill that the cesspayers of each barony should elect three persons to be members of the County Board, and that the magistrates resident in that barony should elect a person to be a member of the County Board. That was his plan for reforming the County Boards. He would not limit the amount at which the cesspayer should have the right of voting, and in that respect he followed the provisions of previous Bills which had been introduced, but not passed into law. He believed that the proportion of three cesspayers to one magistrate would make a good board. His great desire was to bring the gentry of Ireland and the ratepayers more together, as he felt sure that the more they associated with each other in the jury box and at local Boards, and the more they knew of their common interests, the more they would respect each other and live in harmony together throughout the country. His Bill contained clauses for the carrying out of the principle of this Bill, but he was afraid that as regarded the machinery of the Bill he had not been successful. Edmund Burke said that only a man sitting in a seat of authority could properly frame administrative clauses. He would like to see the Grand Jury in Ireland composed as the Grand Jury in England was of the first men in the county—of resident proprietors, and not of the agents of absentee proprietors. Under the present system in Ireland the sheriff nominated the agent of an absentee proprietor as a person to administer the affairs of a district. The administration of the law was degraded by that system. And there was a far greater evil connected with that system—namely, that in this great taxation for county purposes the people who paid the taxes had no representation. It was an enormous advantage to the people to teach them to have a voice in the expenditure of the taxes to which they contributed. A taxpayer, if he had a voice, however small, in the expenditure of the taxes levied upon himself and his fellow taxpayers, felt very differently on that subject from a taxpayer who had no representation in the administration of money which was obtained by taxation. The taxes of which he was speaking were imposed by the Grand Jury and wholly paid by occupiers of property. Often some of the best men in England complained that the people of Ireland did not manifest sufficient self-reliance, and he was sorry to confess that the charge was true; but as long as the people of Ireland were deprived of having a voice with regard to the expenditure of the taxes which they were compelled to pay for the administration of the affairs of their own localities—as long as agents of absentee landed proprietors could dictate what local taxes they should pay—as long as they had no chance of being trained in a way which would stimulate independence, how could we expect them to manifest a self-reliant spirit? Not only were the people of Ireland not taught lessons of self-reliance, but what little self-reliance they had was taken away from them by teaching them in everything to look to the authorities of Dublin Castle as the supreme directors of their local affairs. He felt deeply that the people of Ireland would never become really independent until they obtained free institutions and were made responsible for the management of their own affairs. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Butt.)

Mr. BRUEN, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, it was on account of two objections that he took that course—first, because he considered the measure did not satisfy those requirements which the treatment of the subject demanded; and, secondly, because the existing Grand Jury system did not require that subversive treatment which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick proposed. It was, in his opinion, quite unnecessary to transfer the powers of the Grand Jury to the representative Council contemplated. Before there could be any taxation of property and expenditure of county monies there must be a presentment to the quarter sessions, next there must be a presentment to the Grand Jury, and after that it must come before a Judge of Assize for his fiat. In all these proceedings the interests of ratepayers and of the owners of property were represented and taken care of. The presentment sessions, at which all money presentments and orders for the performance of works must be originated, though composed of cesspayers and magistrates who bore the taxation of the country, did not, he admitted, thoroughly represent the cesspayers, but that portion of the existing Grand Jury laws could easily be amended. In considering the question the hon. and learned Member for Limerick started with the assumption that the rates were paid by the occupiers in a greater proportion than by the owners. The cesspayers, no doubt, paid those rates in the first instance, but those rates were deducted from the rents they paid, and therefore ultimately the burden of those rates were borne by the landlords. The truth of this proposition had been affirmed by more than one Committee of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed by his Bill to give an undue influence to that portion of the community which paid the least rates—namely, the occupiers—because he proposed that three representatives of the occupiers in each barony should be elected members of the proposed County Board, which was to take the place of the Grand Jury, and only one member of the County Board should be elected by the justices to represent the owners of property. If the Bill were made law, in the county of Antrim, for instance, there would be 59 members of the County Board, and of those only 12 would be the representatives of owners of property. In the county of Armagh, the County Board would consist of 42 members, and of those only eight would be representatives of the owners of property. In the county he (Mr. Bruen) represented there would be 35 members of the County Board, and of those only seven would be representatives of the owners of property. In the county of Cork there would be 82 members of the County Board, and of these only 12 would be representatives of the owners of property. He thought he had shown that the direct representation which the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to give

to owners of property was not a just proportion. In any case where the interest of owners and that of occupiers conflicted, the former would be swamped by the latter under the system proposed by the hon. and learned Member. That was not fair or just. One reason why he asked that the present system should not be destroyed was that it was one which could without any serious alteration be easily moulded so as to get rid of any injustice which might be supposed to exist under it. With regard to the complaint of the hon. and learned Member that the occupiers of property were not represented under the present system, that matter could be easily remedied by enabling the cesspayers of each barony, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1868, to elect their own representatives, and determining that the number so elected should not be overridden by the justices. No doubt, to a great extent the Grand Jury panel was constituted by the sheriff, but that official was bound to distribute his selection over the entire county, and it was not in many instances that sheriffs placed on Grand Jury panels the representatives of absentee landlords. The Select Committee of 1868 held that Grand Juries were in reality efficient representatives of the landed property of the county. He had never heard it urged that by the action of the sheriffs landed property was imperfectly represented. If the owners of property felt that they were not represented in the management of local affairs they would certainly complain, and the circumstance that they had preferred no complaint on the subject was extremely significant. The existing Grand Jury laws did not require to be altered as regarded presentment sessions and Grand Juries in the manner proposed by the Bill. In what county had the Grand Jury shown itself unfit to discharge the duties or to exercise the power with which it was invested? Ireland, since the introduction of the Grand Jury system, was covered with some of the best roads in the world, constructed on economical principles. The statement that county cess had uniformly been increased was not borne out by the facts. On the contrary, he maintained that it had rather diminished than increased. The accusation could not be brought against the Grand Jury system that it had failed to accomplish that which it was constituted to perform, and he therefore submitted that no case had been made out for its abolition; on the contrary, he thought it should be improved. The Bill they were discussing was studded, in his opinion, with imperfections which rendered it most undesirable that it should be read a second time. Amongst others he might allude to the female franchise which it created, and to Clause 7, which gave occupiers rated under £4 power of exercising by a vote large influence in the choice of representatives for these proposed County Boards, and it encouraged by the creation of new offices the reverse of economy. He was bound, however, to admit that he approved that provision in the Bill which gave the cesspayers more representation on the boards of management of lunatic asylums. Very judiciously, he maintained, could more direct representation be introduced. The best part of the Bill was that which related to compensation for malicious outrages; but, on the whole, he thought he had made out a good case for asking the House to reject the Bill.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the Bill which stood on the Paper in his name was designed to achieve, in some respects, the object which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had in view. Having canvassed his constituents twice, he was in a position to say there was no secondary question on which they were so united as that they should be represented in some way on the Grand Jury in reference to fiscal questions. After the last Election, he prepared a scheme which he thought would give the occupiers a fair share in the representation, and his Bill was actually printed before that of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was in type. Thus it happened that the two measures appeared on the Paper to-day; but his was not a rival scheme to that of his hon. and learned Friend—which, indeed, he approved and intended to vote for. Many of the objections which had been raised by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) formed no ground for rejecting the Bill, because they were objections which could more properly be dealt with in Committee.

The present system was so bad that he and those who acted with him found it difficult to persuade Englishmen that so bad a system could be tolerated for one moment. Grand Jury cess amounted annually to £1,219,000 on a valuation of £13,300,000, or nearly 2s. in the pound, which was 12 times as great as the present rate of income tax falling exclusively on the occupiers of land, and yet being with equal exclusiveness administered solely by the proprietors of land. His (Captain Nolan's) Bill only aimed at dealing with the Grand Jury system in Ireland, and in that respect it differed from the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick. The Grand Juries had £500,000 to deal with over which the barony sessions had no control. They had the appointments of the county officers; the cesspayers had no voice in their selection. The main point which the hon. Member for Carlow touched upon, and to which he expressed some objection, was "popular" representation.

MR. BRUEN explained that he did not object to popular representation, which harmonized and was associated with the action of the baronial sessions.

CAPTAIN NOLAN resumed: The principle of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was that the magistrates should be vested with the power of one-fourth of the representation, and the remainder of the electoral representation to be in the hands of the occupiers. The Bill was an extremely good one, and he should be glad to see it passed into a law, because it would remove a great many of the complaints that at present existed against the present system. He, however, differed from the hon. and learned Member as to the election of County Boards. It was a fair compromise; but if the Bill was rejected, it would be a better point of agitation that they should be elected by the whole of the ratepayers with the Ballot machinery, and not as proposed in the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend. He urged the desirability of the elections taking place upon the Parliamentary lists, and that the same election districts should be adopted, as a means of saving expense. With respect to the Grand Juries, the existing system of selection by the sheriffs was defective. There were in several of the counties in Ireland members of families who expressed themselves very much annoyed if not selected to serve on Grand Juries. But care should be taken that in the selection of Grand Juries Party spirit should not be imported into the choice. If the Bill now under consideration were rejected, the occupiers would assuredly get up an agitation, and would insist on their right to elect all the members of the Grand Jury. At present, in choosing Grand Jurors, the sheriff was under no restriction; he could summon whom he pleased, provided they had a certain property qualification. But surely representation ought to accompany taxation, and the ratepayers should have the power to elect the men who were to tax them. He thought that County Boards would give people legitimate means of combining in order to pass any measure which they might believe to be of public advantage. One object of great public importance which might have been promoted in this way was the construction of Irish railways upon the security of local rates. If these Boards were refused, Parliament would take upon itself a great deal of responsibility, and would probably retard in no small degree the development of the material interests of Ireland.

MR. STEPHEN MOORE would only say a few words; and first he would say that he was opposed to the Bill brought in by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt); and in opposing it he would take a shorter line in his argument than that taken by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen). He would not go into a consideration and discussion of the whole of the clauses, but he would say that he objected to the Bill as a whole. He could not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that there was such a necessity for amendment of the Grand Jury system in Ireland as he advocated. The Grand Jury system in Ireland was an institution that had existed for a great number of years, and had been found to work beneficially. There might have been some faults in it. As had been stated, some of them were in allowing the high sheriff to evade the law by which Grand Juries were constituted; but he maintained that there were blots to be found in every large institution. With regard to the allegation that there had been Grand Jury jobs, to put down which a more perfect system was required, he would point out to the House that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had said that jobs were allowable, and that would upset the whole purpose and object of the hon. and gallant Member's Bill. He allowed that in large institutions jobbery was not only allowable, but desirable.

CAPTAIN NOLAN: I never had the slightest intention of giving utterance to such an extraordinary statement.

MR. STEPHEN MOORE said, the hon. and gallant Member might not have given utterance to that statement in those precise terms; but he was understood to say that it was right at times to choose certain men to carry out a particular work even though their appointment was opposed by some. Well, this in the minds of those who so opposed was jobbery. Now, as regarded this Bill, they had had in Ireland, unfortunately for some time, what might be called "sensational" agitation for legislation on the subject of the Grand Jury system in Ireland. He meant by "sensational," that it was uncalled for, and it was certainly opposed to the "Conservative" view of Ireland. He quoted the words of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, indicating that there was a strong feeling of Conservatism in Ireland. Grand Juries were a very old institution in Ireland, and Irishmen, after all, were attached to old institutions. In his opinion, this agitation was got up by sensation-mongers in Ireland, though he did not point the phrase at the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick. There was one thing in which he was agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman, and that was that any system that could bring about a friendly feeling between the landlords and the ratepayers on the question of rating was desirable; but he must say, with regard to the election and selection of Poor Law Guardians, that all ratepayers were not suited by education, and that there were some chosen as members of Boards of Guardians who were not as well suited to deal with the financial questions as they might be. With regard to the Grand Juries, they were generally composed of men of education, and they were not more apt to err than other large assemblies; and when the hon. and gallant Member for Galway said there were large sums of the money of the counties in the hands of the Grand Juries in Ireland, he did not tell the English and Scotch Members that the presentments had to be approved by the baronial sessions or counties. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick had certainly not brought any charges against the Grand Juries, but he had against the high sheriffs. Now he (Mr. Stephen Moore) had the honour of acquaintance with many of the high sheriffs in Ireland, and to his knowledge they had exerted themselves in a most impartial manner in the discharge of their duties in selecting gentlemen to sit on Grand Juries in their counties. There were, when the members to serve on Grand Juries were about to be selected in the counties, many who were desirous to go abroad; and there were many, who were owners of property, who did not desire to sit on Grand Juries. It was, however, always desirable to have owners of property on the Grand Juries. It had been said that members of baronies should only have power to vote on questions relating to their own particular baronies; but that he (Mr. Stephen Moore) thought would be as invidious as it would be to say that a Member of this House should not vote on any question not affecting his own particular county or borough. The strongest argument that had ever come under his notice happened in the South of Ireland, at a meeting of a Board of Guardians, wherein a very influential member of that board, said—"Of all the bodies in Ireland, the Grand Juries are the only bodies who are above corruption."

Mr. O'REILLY, in supporting the measure, thought that the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. Stephen Moore) had not read the Bill, or he would not have given utterance to the sentiments which he had expressed in his speech. He wished to state the question as regarded Grand Juries fairly. For 29 years he had been a member of a county Grand Jury in Ireland, and he admitted they had done their duty creditably. As to the question of presentment sessions, they were at present the only representative form of fiscal management in a county, and in them the Grand Jury determined for each barony the number of cesspayers to be associated with the justices. They were not always the cesspayers, the selection being left to the representative of the county. For instance, suppose a barony, nothing was easier than to select for that particular year the cesspayers who were known to be in favour of the road, and the next year other cesspayers would be selected. Then, as for the magistrates, he challenged the statement that they represented property in any large proportion. There were scores of men who held more land and paid more county cess than many who, from circumstances, had been made magistrates. One objection to the Grand Jury system was, that it was a temporary, transient, and shifting body. It was fair to infer that where there was liability to abuse it might occur, and he therefore thought there ought to be some better control over the patronage of the county offices now possessed by the Grand Jury. When an office became vacant the Grand Jurors were widely canvassed, and the selection might depend upon a slight change in the panel which might be made by the sheriff. He had known cases in Ulster and Leinster in which barony cess collectors had been appointed at 1s. and 10d. in the pound when the collection had been tendered for at 6d. In his opinion, it was desirable to mingle classes in the administration of their common interests. In Ireland bodies for local government might be classed under three heads. There were corporations which had the control of roads and buildings, local administration, and, to a considerable extent, of local institutions; then there were Boards of Guardians for the relief of the poor, the control of medical relief, and with authority in sanitary matters; and, thirdly, there were the Grand Juries. By the measure of his hon. and learned Friend it was proposed that all these bodies should be amalgamated, and he would suggest whether it would not be well for Ireland if they were to devote themselves to the question of organizing a good system of county government, which should solely deal with all the matters now administered by the present branches of county government—namely, the Boards of Guardians and the Grand Juries. The same central body should also have the control of education. He was persuaded that such a system would be attended with efficiency and economy. He should heartily support the Bill.

Mr. CONOLLY said, that as the system proposed in the Bill would not furnish in any proper sense a representation of property, those who advocated it advocated an absurdity. He admitted there was a great deal of the feudal element in our Grand Jury system, but it was capable of improvement by an admixture of popular representation. He objected, however, to be governed by the mob. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side proposed, first of all, to destroy, and then to re-construct; but he, as a supporter of Conservative principles, declined to abolish an old system simply on the ground that it contained flaws; because, from close observation, it would be seen that it would be far easier to remedy these flaws than to set up an entirely new machinery. He thought, however, that the Government would do well if they should turn their attention to those points in the Grand Jury Laws which were capable of amendment. If they did so, they would receive assistance, not only from the other side of the House, but from the Grand Juries themselves.

MR. MC CARTHY DOWNING said, it was satisfactory to find that, from both sides of the House, the Government had received opinions that the Grand Jury system was defective, and ought to be amended. The question had been agitated for 35 years; several Committees had reported against the present Grand Jury system, and if the late Government had taken action on the Report of the Committee of 1868 it would not have been necessary to introduce this Bill. The practical exclusion of cesspayers from presentment sessions impaired, and sometimes destroyed their representative character, and this grievance could be remedied by making Poor Law Guardians also the cesspayers of those sessions. Their experience as Guardians fitted them to act with magistrates in managing county affairs. The county cess had risen largely in many counties. He admitted that, in his own county, the Grand Jury attended to public interests and conserved the public purse; but this result was not regarded with so much satisfaction as it would be if the Grand Jury possessed a more representative character. The late Government endeavoured in some way to meet the question, but the Bill brought in two years ago was not at all suited to meet the case. He believed there was no measure which the people of Ireland were more anxious about, as a secondary measure, than the present, and he thought the Government would meet with a large share of popularity if they supported a Bill to remedy the defects in the existing system, and gave a fair representation to the ratepayers of the country.

MR. MULHOLLAND opposed the Bill, which he considered was really a measure to abolish the present Grand Jury system in Ireland, and that was a strong course to take with an institution which, as had been said by hon. Members opposite, was looked upon with veneration. That system had been reported upon by a Committee, when it was held that the system had not been productive of any cause of complaint. He believed the Grand Jury system fully enjoyed the confidence of the people, and that Grand Juries were more strict guardians of the public purse than the presentment sessions. He trusted the Government would be able at some future time to bring in a Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Committee of 1868. Presentment sessions ought to be more representative, but he hoped Grand Juries would not be interfered with.

MR. STACPOOLE believed the Grand Juries of Ireland really represented the property of that country. They were ratepayers as well as Grand Jurors, and in that way they paid a large proportion of the county cess. If they had elected Boards there would be a good deal of jobbery, because the cesspayers were the greatest jobbers possible, their principle being "Scratch me and I'll scratch you." It also should be borne in mind that Grand Juries could not originate any taxation, that being done at presentment sessions—in fact, they had only a veto. He trusted the Government would leave the Grand Juries as a final Court of Appeal.

MR. MUNTZ said, that if it were possible for an English Member to comprehend an Irish question, he had gathered that the Grand Jury cess meant this—that a certain number of gentlemen were appointed by the High Sheriff of the county, and that they had the power of taxing the ratepayers. ["No, no!"] Well, he did not know what they might call the power of taxation; but he thought that where the Grand Juries had the power to guarantee a dividend to a railway, that was very much like a power of taxation. If the hon. Member for Downpatrick, who had just spoken, had been in the last Parliament, he would have had the pleasure of hearing the subject discussed. He would remind the House that, upon that occasion, there was a long discussion upon a guarantee given by the Grand Jury, county of Waterford—a guarantee of 5 per cent to a railway for the little convenience of having the line taken through their land, and which 5 per cent, if it was paid, would have to come out of the rate to be levied on the county. This had been his experience of the Grand Jury cess, and it had occurred to him—"How would we like such a state of things in this country?" He felt it was absolutely indispensable to govern Ireland as a part of the Empire—as a part of ourselves—and that being the case, he looked upon the present Bill as a glorious attempt on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, and an attempt which did credit to him, to remedy the present objectionable state of the law. He would vote for the second reading of the Bill, merely in the hope that it might have some weight with the Government in inducing them to legislate upon the subject.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the speech they had just heard showed the difficulty felt by English Members in discussing Irish affairs, because the hon. Member said the Irish Grand Jury system was a thing he would not put up with in his own country; and yet it was a fact, that whatever might be said of the Irish Grand Jury system, it was, at any rate, so far as regarded the representation of the cess or ratepayers, in advance of the English system. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) had suggested that in consequence of the various opinions expressed during this debate, the Government would be easily able to make up their minds to introduce a measure to deal with the question; but he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had found a singular want of unanimity on the part of those who had spoken as to the defects in the present law and as to the manner in which those defects should be remedied. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) said the Irish should act like the English, independently of centralizing influence. Now, in England the levying and the administration of county taxation were not in the hands of representatives elected by those who paid the rates; they were even less so than was the case in Ireland. The county magistrates levied and controlled the whole amount of the county rate levied in English counties for prisons, police, lunatic asylums, county buildings, and county bridges; although they had nothing to do with the management of roads, which were managed by Highway Boards and surveyors of parishes. The English system, therefore, involved a far greater anomaly than the present state of the Grand Jury law in Ireland, where the Grand Juries had rather a controlling than an initiative power. The advocates of this Bill rather unduly depreciated the value of the Report of the Committee of 1868, although that Committee comprised Representatives of the popular party. The Report was one of the fullest and ablest documents ever presented to the House; and in that Report the Committee said—

"Practically, the Grand Jury now forms a Court of Appeal from the decisions arrived at in presentment sessions, and all proposals for county works, with slight exceptions, came before presentment sessions and cannot be legally sanctioned except with their approval."

In these presentment sessions the cess-payers were represented, but he would not say that they were represented in a satisfactory way. Yet they were more directly represented than county ratepayers in England. But why had proposals for abolishing the theoretical anomalies in English county government met with so little favour? Because we in England looked at the matter in a practical spirit. However great the anomaly might be in theory, in practice the result was an economical and able administration of county affairs. If the same test were applied to Ireland, if Irishmen would ask themselves how far, by the adoption of such a system as that sketched by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, their county affairs would be better and more economically administered, he was not sure they would be ready to alter the existing system. The Committee of 1868 came to the conclusion that, however open to objection certain parts of the system might be in theory, its administration was generally pure and economical. Indeed, it had been admitted that it was not the Grand Jury who were most liable to the temptation to jobbery; and no money could have been expended more economically than the money which had been laid out upon the roads of Ireland. The Committee said that no increase in the Grand Jury cess had been shown to be due to the extravagance of the Grand Juries; but could the same statement be made of some of the elected municipal councils of England and Ireland? Under those circumstances the Committee did not consider it necessary to recommend the abolition of the existing system, believing it could be so far modified as to do away with all just objections that were raised to it; and they did not believe it would be desirable to abolish or materially alter the constitution of Grand Juries, which, as a general rule, represented the landed property of the counties. The desirability of some further control by the cesspayers over the administration and taxation of the Irish counties had always been admitted, and measures for the amendment of the Grand Jury system with this view had been from time to time proposed. The Committee to which reference had been made recommended certain alterations in the constitution of Grand Juries in order to secure that they should be thoroughly representative in their character. They proposed that no person should be elected to serve on any Grand Jury who was not connected with the county by property or residence; that lists of qualified persons should be prepared; that no barony should have two representatives on a Grand Jury until one from every other barony in the county was nominated, or until the list of qualified persons was exhausted. He thought, without expressing any final opinion on these recommendations, that they were practical and in the right direction, and they could easily be introduced into an amending Bill. At the same time, it should be remembered that the Bill brought in by the late Government two years ago was so unfavourably received as to show that this question was surrounded with difficulties. What was offered, however, for their acceptance in the measure before them? The Bill proposed that, instead of the Grand Juries appointed under the existing law, there should be elected representative Councils so constituted as to include a stronger ratepaying element than was found among the magistrates who at present formed the Grand Juries. In addition to the ratepayers it was proposed that the councils should include, as ex officio members, the mayor and one member of the town Council of every borough included within each particular county, together with one member from each Board of Guardians. He failed to see why this class of ex officio members need be elected, seeing that the ratepayers would, as a body, be represented by the elected members of the Councils. Taking the proposals altogether, he contended that they would give undue influence to the occupiers of property, and arm them with a greater proportion of power than had been suggested in any proposal heretofore offered to the House. On the whole, he thought that the existing Grand Jury, which represented the social influence and high character of the landowners of the country, was an element in local government which could not be replaced by any Council constituted on the principles laid down in this Bill. The real grievance in the present system was that, although the Grand Jury law professed in various ways to give an adequate amount of representation to the taxpayers, it failed in making that a real representation. That was admitted on all hands, and the Committee which sat in 1868 made a number of suggestions based on practical good sense, in order to remedy that defective state of things. One of these recommendations, however, would have tended to an undue multiplication of elections—an unfortunate circumstance in connection with bodies which we entrusted with the administration of local affairs. Another suggestion, that the Grand Jury cess should fall equally on the owner and occupier of property, might be most unjust in the case of existing leases, where the tenant had covenanted to pay the entire amount in consideration of other advantages. As far as he was able to judge off-hand, the suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for Cork County was by no means a bad one. It was that the elected Poor Law Guardians should be, ex officio, the representatives of the cesspayers at the presentment sessions for the districts in which they were elected. That plan would, he thought, work well if the boundaries of the electoral divisions were made conterminous with those of baronies, and divisions of counties. If a scheme could be framed which would provide uniform areas for the payment of local rates and the work of local administration, he thought it might include a remedy for all the real grievances which could be said to exist under the existing Grand Jury system. He could not undertake that next Session he should be able to introduce a Bill relating to this matter; but he would endeavour, when an opportunity was afforded him, to lay a scheme before the House based upon the principles which he had laid down. In conclusion, he could not hope on such an occasion to secure the support of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway, who wished for a complete revolution in the system of county administration; but he might appeal for the assistance of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, whose speeches on questions of the kind were always eminently Conservative. There were other questions connected with Irish legislation which were more pressing than this, and he hoped, therefore, that it would not be thought necessary on the present occasion to press a Bill which, instead of proceeding upon the lines he had indicated, was based upon the destruction of much that was valuable and efficient, in order to remedy a grievance mainly theoretical, by the substitution of a system from which no one expected to obtain better practical results than were at present achieved.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the right hon. Baronet whether he intended that the Poor Law Board of Guardians should be the elements from which the new body should be taken under his indicated measure of next Session?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, his suggestion was that the elected Guardians should be members of presentment sessions, and have a voice from the presentment sessions to the county presentment sessions.

MR. BUTT, in reply, said, the right hon. Baronet had correctly described him as a Conservative; but he was Conservative in the sense of placing his trust in the people and wishing to secure for them a fair share in the representation, rather than in the sense of that new-fangled Conservatism which would crush popular rights and place all the power in the hands of the few who happened to possess the wealth of a country. The Grand Juries in England stood upon a footing altogether different from those in Ireland, whose members were selected by the sheriffs, and who further had an altogether different class of duties to perform. He regarded the old Grand Jury system as of great importance, considering the objects with which it had to deal, and he looked upon the proposal to give to Grand Juries a power to impose taxation upon the counties as an excrescence upon the old constitutional objects for which they were appointed. The power to impose taxation upon the counties was, however, now proposed to be given to an isolated body, comprising 23 gentlemen selected by an officer of the Crown. For his own part, he should far rather have a fixed than a fluctuating body, but they committed the management of local affairs in Ireland to this isolated body. If the gentry would come to reside among the people of Ireland, the people would have confidence in them, and they would get rid of this class legislation. The principle of the Bill before the House was to give to the people of Ireland a control over the local taxation of the country. He should certainly feel it his duty, after what he had heard the right hon. Gentleman state, to divide the House.

MR. LAW congratulated his hon. Friends on that side of the House on the interesting and valuable discussion which had taken place on the Bill. It seemed now to be universally admitted that the present system was one which could not be maintained, and he must say he thought the right hon. Baronet opposite had indicated a satisfactory mode of dealing with the question. He could not see any disposition on the part of any hon. Members to deal with the subject as a matter of class legislation, and he would therefore, after the sketch which the right hon. Baronet had given of the measure which he intended to introduce next Session, appeal to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick not to press his Bill to a division. The Bill which the right hon. Baronet had promised would in the main carry out the recommendations of the Committee of 1868 pretty much as the late Government proposed to do two years ago, by making the representation of the general body of taxpayers on the presentment sessions real, instead of ideal, and at the same time reforming instead of putting an end to the existing Grand Jury system.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, on the contrary, hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not shrink from a division. The real question on which they were about to decide was whether representation should go with taxation or not in future in Ireland. That was a principle which was dear to the people of England, and it would be an important point gained to have the sense of the House taken on it on that occasion. Another question on which they would also divide was whether Grand Juries should be relegated to their true and proper functions—namely, those of dealing with criminal business. Moreover, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had carefully guarded himself against promising to bring in a Bill on that subject next year.

MR. ARTHUR MOORE said, he was not at all satisfied with the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, and hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not shrink from ascertaining the opinion of the House upon his Bill. Such a great variety of matters was now brought before Grand Juries that it was impossible for the county business to be properly done.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to enable companies to establish savings banks for their servants, the matter being purely voluntary as between master and man. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Law

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Edward Watkin.)

MR. SALT, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, he held that savings banks ought to be under regulation by law. These would not be, and he should therefore move the rejection of the Bill. He did not question the good intentions of the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill; but he contended that the Bill, as drawn, if he rightly understood it, might lead to undesirable, if not to disastrous results. The Bill practically proposed to embody in a public and general Act certain provisions contained in two private Acts relating to important railway companies. The clauses to which he referred enabled a company to collect money on deposit as in a savings bank from its servants, and to employ this money in the business of the company. No sufficient regulations were to be found in the Bill for publicity, and no efficient scheme for Government control. He repeated that, especially in the case of weak companies, this system might lead to disaster.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Salt.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not disposed to throw any impediments in the way of the extension of savings banks; but the House was not in a position to deal this Session with the question raised by that measure. The whole subject of the reform of savings banks was one which demanded the attention of Parliament and of the Government, and he hoped to be able at the proper time to take it up. There was no use in carrying the measure further then.

ARTIZANS DWELLINGS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for facilitating the Improvement of the Dwellings of the Working Classes in Large Towns in Scotland, said, that early in the Session he had promised, the moment the Artizans Dwellings Bill for England had received the Royal Assent, that he would introduce a similar measure, precisely on the same terms, applicable to Scotland—of course, on the understanding that it should be passed as it was drawn. He accordingly now moved for leave to bring in the measure referred to.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for facilitating the Improvement of the Dwellings of the Working Classes in Large Towns in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross and The LORD ADVOCATE.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL.

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

(nos. 81, 169.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, "That the House do now go into Committee on the said Bill."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that though this important Bill was introduced at a reasonably early period, he thought there was just ground of complaint that their Lordships should not be asked to go into Committee until the month of July. He believed the fact to be that the noble Marquess who had charge of the Bill had hardly estimated the difficulties which stood in the way of the legislation he proposed. He admitted that some of the Amendments which the noble Marquess proposed to make in the Bill would effect a considerable improvement in it, especially that which proposed to extend the measure to the whole of the United Kingdom. He had never been able to see why Ireland should be excluded from the benefits of the Bill. But the Amendments had not removed the serious difficulties which surrounded the question. For instance, while requiring persons to remove pollutions, the Bill gave them no power to comply with the law. No amount of filtration would get rid of the deleterious matter in sewage; and, unless power were given to the authorities charged with the carrying out of the Bill to take land for the purpose of disposing of the sewage upon it, he did not see how the object in view could be effected by legislation. With the exception of the provisions relating to solid matter, he did not think it would be practicable to carry out the requirements of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Law as to Pollution of Rivers.

Clause 2 (Prohibition as to putting solid matters into streams) agreed to.

Clause 3 (Prohibition as to drainage of sewage into streams).

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH having proposed certain verbal Amendments, of which no printed copies had been delivered—

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY expressed an opinion that Amendments in so important a Bill ought to have been printed.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH explained that there was no time for him to have had his Amendments printed, as the Bill, in its present shape, had only been in the hands of noble Lords since Monday.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL must express his opinion that more time ought to be given for the consideration of the subject before their Lordships were asked to agree to a clause affecting such large interests as those which would be dealt with by Clause 3. If the noble Duke had only had the Bill since Monday, persons in the country greatly interested in the measure could not have had an opportunity of seeing it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that this clause in substance had been before the country since May last. Undoubtedly some slight alterations had been made; but it was a new doctrine that every time a slight alteration was introduced into a clause it was necessary to interpose a long period, in order to enable persons in the country to appreciate the Amendment. He feared that under such a rule in their Parliamentary proceedings their pace, which was not remarkably rapid, would be reduced to an absolute standstill.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, it was true that a Bill on the subject of the pollution of rivers was introduced by the noble Marquess in an able speech as far back as May; but since that the noble Marquess, in another speech, had informed their Lordships that the Government felt obliged to alter their plan, and had introduced clauses making necessary alterations: so that it was, in fact, a new Bill that their Lordships were asked to go into Committee upon at this late period of the Session.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND expressed his concurrence with the noble Viscount. He would remind the noble Marquess that in his speech the other evening, when he announced the intention of the Government to abandon portions of the Bill, he stated distinctly what they were. But now Amendments were to be proposed of which they had heard nothing until Monday last, and it was impossible their Lordships could now discuss them in a proper manner. The month of July was too late a period to commence dealing with a measure which affected such large interests throughout the country.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET wished to point out that if their Lordships turned to Clause 14—the Interpretation Clause of the Bill—they would find that “stream” shall include—

“Rivers, streams, canals, lakes, and water-courses of every description, and such tidal waters or portions of the sea as the special authority or the Local Government Board shall determine.”

From that definition their Lordships might judge how extensive would be the operation of Clause 3. He submitted that their Lordships ought to pause before giving their sanction to such a clause. He thought the clause should be struck out altogether—there was no other mode of amending it.

EARL GREY, on the contrary, hoped that the clause would be retained, as it was really the only practical part of the measure. The evils of river pollution had become so serious that it was high time some check should be put to it. Many of our streams would have been comparatively pure to-day had a similar Bill to the one under discussion been introduced long ago. He hoped their Lordships would not reject any practicable mode of dealing with it.

Moved, “To leave out Clause 1.”—
(The Duke of Somerset.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the noble Duke’s objection to the clause would have been urged more appropriately on the second reading, as the 3rd clause really embodied the essence of the Bill. Their Lordships might as well reject the whole Bill as strike out Clause 3. When they came to the Interpretation Clause, they might modify the definition of the word “stream,” if it was thought necessary to do so, though he did not say that it was.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that under certain local Acts there was an obligation in particular localities to drain tidal waters, but “stream” as used in this Bill would include such tidal waters as the Local Government Board might please to subject to the operation of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY recommended their Lordships not to put too much stress on the Proviso at the end of the clause. The great object of the Bill was, as far as possible, to remedy the neglects of by-gone years, and to save our rivers from further pollution, so far as was practicable by legislation. The great error of former legislation was that it left private persons at liberty to pollute our streams, the purity of which was so essential to the public health: the object of the Government, and of this Bill, was to put a stop to that power in future. If their Lordships rejected this clause, pollution would go on as it had done before, and, perhaps, go on indefinitely.

LORD SELBORNE said, that the Proviso was the most important part of the clause. Without that Proviso, the only change made by the Bill was to substitute the County Courts for the Court of Chancery, as the tribunal for trying and adjudicating upon complaints arising out of pollution. As the clause at present stood, no new pollution was to be allowed; but the Proviso enacted that no one who before the Act had polluted a stream, should be deemed to commit an offence against the Act, though he might continue to pollute it, if he proved that he had used "the best practicable and available means" to render the sewage harmless. It occurred to him that the question what were "the best practicable and available means" would be a very difficult one, and yet the County Court was to decide it. The case of the Birmingham Corporation, and some other cases which had been before the Court of Chancery, showed how difficult it was to decide such a question. Again, there might be evidence enough on that point to exonerate the party in the eyes of the County Court, and yet the river would continue to be polluted.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply to the point raised by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Airlie), said, that the objection might be very easily dealt with. It would be easy to declare that where there was a right or an obligation under a local Act to drain tidal waters, the Local Government Board should have no right to declare those tidal waters subject to this Bill. As to the Proviso to the clause under discussion, his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) said that without it the Bill did nothing but substitute the County Courts for the Court of Chancery. His noble and learned Friend forgot that this Bill would throw upon a public body the obligation to do what was at present left to private individuals. The Bill provided an expeditious, a simple, and a cheap mode of proceeding, and it set out a category in which were stated what were to be regarded as offences against the Act and punished accordingly. As to the Proviso, all it provided was that where the pollution existed in January, 1875, and it was shown that "the best practicable and available means" had been taken to purify the matter conveyed into the stream, no offence was to be deemed to have been committed under this Act; but the existing law stated that there was a right to prevent pollution, and that right would not be taken away by this Bill. He admitted that it was difficult to decide what were "the best practicable and available means;" but the Government had not been able to devise anything better than this test. If his noble and learned Friend could suggest one, they would be delighted to receive it. As to submitting so difficult a question to a County Court, he would remind his noble and learned Friend that there was an appeal from that tribunal. The question which the Court of Chancery had to decide in the Birmingham case was not whether "the best practicable and available means" had been used to prevent pollution, but whether the liquid was absolutely harmless.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that noble Lords on his side did not dispute the principle of the clause, but only doubted the means by which it was to be carried out. Under the existing law, if anyone polluted a river he might be proceeded against in the Court of Chancery, and the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had explained that the right of proceeding in that way would not be taken away by this Bill. Technically that was true; but if Parliament passed a Bill like this, it would be compelled to take away all remedies against the pollution of rivers except that provided by the Bill. He feared the effect of the Proviso would be to give a kind of charter to corporations in the matter of sewage, so long as they were using "the best practicable and available means" to render their sewage harmless. Such a state of the law could not long be maintained.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he exonerated noble Lords opposite from any desire to oppose the general principle of this Bill. He must, however, remark that the course of this discussion had been not a little singular. It arose on Amendments proposed by the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch) which were small in amount and purely verbal; and on others that had been introduced in consequence of suggestions from noble Lords opposite themselves. Then an objection was taken that the clause itself would interfere with very great interests; but his noble Friend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) pointed out that though alterations had been made in other parts of the Bill, this clause was now substantially the same what it was when the Bill was introduced in May last. Then objections were urged against the clause itself, which if effect were given to them would render the whole Bill worthless. The noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Grey) had pointed out what the effect of these objections must be. It did not seem to be remembered by some noble Lords that though the provisions of the Bill were to be carried out by local bodies they would be carried out under the supervision of a great Department of the Government, and in the full blaze of public opinion. Then as to the Proviso, and the defence which it allowed, in cases in which the pollution had been going on and previously to January, 1875, their Lordships would do well to bear in mind that in all legislation what were called vested interests had to be to some extent regarded, and that a very great good would be achieved if the future pollution of rivers were prevented. He admitted that if the Bill in its original integrity could have been carried he would have preferred it; but he asked their Lordships not to reject on objections such as had been urged that evening legislation which had been so long called for, and which even in the shape in which it was then before their Lordships was calculated to do so much good.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) knew that it was very easy to get up opposition to any Bill dealing with the subject to which the one before their Lordships was directed; but there was no desire on the part of noble Lords on the Opposition side to oppose the principle of the Bill:—on the contrary, as was very well known, there was as great an anxiety on their parts to pass a good measure for the prevention of the pollution of our rivers as there could possibly be on the Government side. Objections were taken to details, and then they were told that these were of the very essence of the Bill—he was not so sure that the Government had yet made up their mind as to what was the essence of the measure. The noble Marquess when introducing the original Bill made a speech of great ability to show how practicable the Bill would be; but the next time he spoke on the subject he showed what insuperable objections there were to some parts of it. The measure was in three divisions—one relating to solid matter, one to sewage, and one to manufacturing impurities. With regard to the first, he believed there was little or no difference on the subject, and that had the Bill been confined to solid matter there would have been no difficulty in passing it; but the noble Marquess must see from what had passed in their Lordships' House that evening that on the other points there were wide differences of opinion. With regard to this Proviso, he feared that if it were passed it would be a great obstruction to future legislation, because it would give to the parties concerned a prescription of wrong doing. He put it to the noble Marquess whether there was any use in the Government passing clauses in their Lordships' House now which in all probability they would have to give up hereafter if they meant the Bill to pass through Parliament during the present Session.

LORD SELBORNE said, he was convinced that they would effect nothing until they got beyond the stage of simply telling people what they ought not to do, and constituted some authority with power to decide clearly what ought to be done.

On Question, That the said clause stand part of the Bill? their Lordships divided:—Contents 85; Not-Contents 45: Majority 40.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Prohibition as to drainage into streams from manufactories).

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND moved the insertion of the word "discolouring" after "noxious," his object being to render the discolouring of a river or stream an offence.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he should have been very glad if it had been in his power to accede to the Amendment. It was a great evil that so many of our more beautiful rivers were discoloured by the processes of manufacture carried on upon their banks; but in dealing with this question the Government had gone upon the principle of preventing that only which was a real wrong, and in doing so not if possible to interfere with industries by which thousands of persons were supported. "Discolouration" of the water was an offence against taste rather than against health or purity. The dyes which produced the greatest discolouration were chiefly logwood, fustic, and vegetable dyes of that kind, but they did not make the water unwholesome. A gentleman had informed him that he discoloured 7,000,000 gallons of water per diem, and that the fish came about his works rather than other parts of the river, and the state of obesity which those fish attained was something striking. He had no evidence on the other side, and was, therefore, forced to admit the statement. No chemical process, however, was known by which these costly dyes could be prevented when used from dyeing the water also, and it rested with their Lordships to say whether the mere æsthetic objection ought in that case to prevail. He believed it was perfectly accurate to say that if words were introduced into the clause to prevent the discolouration of water, the result would be that nine-tenths of the mills in Scotland would have to be closed. Having regard to the interests concerned, he could not accept the Amendment.

LORD CARLINGFORD regretted the noble Marquess had not informed the Committee why it was he proposed the present clause at all. He had understood him to state on a former occasion that the proper complement of the Bill would be another measure to be introduced next year dealing with manufacturing processes; and he had fully understood him to say that the whole of that part of this Bill by which it was intended to interfere with those processes was to be abandoned. He was astonished, therefore, to find Clause 4 in the Bill, and he wished, therefore, to ask the noble Marquess why it was he anticipated by such a clause that complement of legislation to which he had referred — although, indeed, the course proposed by the clause to be adopted was so cumbrous that it could, he thought, have hardly any operation even if passed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY begged to remind the noble Lord that the Question before the Committee was whether the word "discolouring" should be inserted in the clause. He might, however, explain that the object of the clause was that where there was no existing interest it should be absolutely unlawful to introduce new mining or manufacturing pollution into rivers, and that the question of pollution by existing manufactories and mines should be left for consideration to another year. It was proposed by this Bill to take that point of departure which Parliament had hitherto neglected to take, and which, if it had been taken 20 years ago, would have removed many of the difficulties with which Parliament had now to contend in dealing with the subject.

LORD ABERDARE regretted that the Government had not grappled with the question in a more comprehensive spirit, so as to give the largest possible powers to the general and local authorities to execute those works on a great scale of general sewage which alone would enable them to comply with the law.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND was of opinion that the words of the clause as they stood would scarcely carry out the object which the noble Marquess stated he had in view. As to the legislation proposed being piecemeal, he did not at the present advanced period of the Session feel disposed to find fault with the Bill on that account. He thought that at this time it would be somewhat inconvenient to introduce a comprehensive measure. As it was now declared that existing interests were not to be interfered with, he thought the fact should be more clearly stated.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY pointed out that there was this difficulty in the way of inserting a Proviso in the clause declaring that it should not apply to present mining and manufacturing pollution, that when Parliament came to legislate on the subject next year the objection would be raised that it had already given its sanction to the proceedings of existing interests. He should, however, be glad to insert any words in the clause which would express exactly that which was the intention of the Government. He thought the matter must be dealt with very tenderly if it was proposed to make it subject of future legislation.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, the noble Marquess advocated the course which he asked the Committee to sanction on the ground that it would facilitate the progress of any comprehensive measure which might be introduced next year. But how, he should like to know, would it facilitate the passing of such a measure if all those who were now engaged in those trades should stand shoulder to shoulder for the purpose of maintaining the status quo and defending their monopoly? And might not the anticipation of future interference discourage the creation of new manufacturing establishments?

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH urged that by the exercise of skill and the use of proper means for the purpose the pollution of rivers by manufactories might be very considerably reduced. The only effect of the clause would be that those who started new manufactories would be obliged to adopt those remedies which many polluters of rivers were very disinclined even to think of. It was very necessary, indeed, by some measure to prevent new sources of pollution from springing up. Esparto grass, for instance, had been recently introduced for the manufacture of paper, and the refuse of this was of poisonous quality.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought the words of the clause were clear enough. In regard to new manufactories the Bill did not change the law; it did not make anything illegal which was now legal. On the other hand, Clause 6 provided that every sanitary or other local authority having sewers under their control should give facilities, which were not given now, to enable manufacturers within their district to carry noxious liquids into the sewers upon terms to be settled by agreement or arbitration. That was a most material advantage to be afforded to those who set up new manufactories. Then, as to their throwing protection by this Bill around existing manufacturers who polluted rivers and who might hereafter band themselves together against future legislation, he would remind their Lordships that the 12th clause of the Bill provided that—

“All powers given by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers conferred by Act of Parliament, law, or custom, and such other powers may be exercised in the same manner as if this Act had not passed; and nothing in this Act shall legalize any act or default which would but for this Act be deemed to be a nuisance or otherwise contrary to law.”

Therefore, those who were at present polluting rivers would not in the slightest degree be in a better position than they were now. All that was proposed to be done was in creating an improved machinery to say that it should not be put in force in regard to de facto manufacturing operations until after a certain period. The real object was to point to future legislation of some kind or other which was to have the effect of putting in motion the powers of the Bill against those who were now polluting rivers.

LORD SELBORNE thought there was no reason for so fettering proceedings under that Bill, the object being to legislate hereafter. It would be an additional motive to those now engaged in polluting rivers to use their endeavours to prevent future legislation if that Bill were made inapplicable to them until such future legislation was adopted. It would be better, he thought, to say, that proceedings should not be taken for a certain time—say two years—which would give Parliament full opportunity to legislate during the interval so allowed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not believe that the owners of dye-works would have so much Parliamentary influence to prevent the passing of a Bill introduced early in the Session as they might have in July.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL was of opinion that, instead of being an equal law, the Bill would be easy of enforcement against those who might hereafter become manufacturers and difficult of enforcement against those who were at present polluters of streams.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

Clause agreed to.

Administration of Law.

Clause 5 (Sanitary authority to afford facilities for manufactories to drain into sewers) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Power of sanitary authority to enforce Act).

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWN pointed out that in the original Bill the clause had been permissive and that it had now been made compulsory. He had been surprised by this change, for he had noticed it immediately after reading some remarks made elsewhere by the noble Marquess on the superior virtue of the word "may" as compared with the word "shall." He was glad that in this instance the noble Marquess had been guilty of a slight infidelity to his principle. The duty of enforcing this Bill would fall chiefly on the medical officers of the sanitary authorities, and it would be well to consider the position they occupied. Taking one or two cases at random, he found that one medical officer, in a population of 31,000, received £25 a-year; another, in a population of 45,000, had £200; and a third, in a population of 20,000, had £50. They were allowed, of course, private practice in addition. Before powers such as those given by this Bill were conferred upon the local sanitary authorities those bodies should be re-constituted, and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would consider the advisability of bringing in before long some measure to effect an alteration in the direction he indicated.

LORD ABERDARE wished to know whether a local authority higher up the stream was to be liable to prosecution by a local authority lower down the stream?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY replied that if a local authority fouled a stream they would be liable to be prosecuted by the local authority whose stream they fouled. It was rather too much to ask the country to wait for a moderate and necessary measure like the present until some vast re-construction in the constitution of our sanitary authorities had been achieved.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Power of Local Government Board to enforce Act) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Constitution and expenses of conservancy authority).

LORD ABERDARE asked whether some protection should not be given to those local authorities who showed an intention of carrying out the provisions of the Bill against indiscriminate prosecution before their arrangements and works could be completed?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought that the suggestion of the noble Lord was not unreasonable, and would consider the point with the view of amending the clause on the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 183.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—THE SIXTH CLAUSE.

QUESTION.

LORD ESLINGTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, since the passing of Clause 6 of the Merchant Shipping Bill in Committee, he has received a protest from agents of foreign shipowners at Liverpool, Newcastle, Cardiff, Leith, and London against interference with foreign shipping; and, whether he intends to propose, on Report, any alteration of Clause 6, so as to meet the objections of the memorialists?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, that no such protest had been received by the Board of Trade. The 6th clause had not passed, nor been debated, but was postponed. It proposed no interference with foreign shipping; but, on the contrary, its object was the prevention of British ships from assuming falsely a foreign character, which was as much in accordance with applications now being made by foreign Powers to us as it was in the interest of all honest British shipowners, and for this purpose the clause would enable the public officer to demand the production of papers showing the ship's assumed nationality. Some memorials were received in May, but were based upon an entire misconception of the meaning of the 6th clause. He proposed to amend the postponed clauses in their wording before they were brought up again, but not in their substance.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—CASE OF MARY M'MAHON.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is true that one Mary M'Mahon was lately convicted in Cork of a murder committed in Limerick; that the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin was equally divided as to the validity of the verdict; that the verdict was set aside, the junior Justice withdrawing his judgment; and that the gentlemen advising the Crown on the occasion decline to ask the decision of the Court of Appeal on the question of procedure as to whether the court was divided, notwithstanding expressions from the bench suggesting the propriety of appealing; and, whether it is intended that the prisoner shall have immunity from all penal consequences of the murder; and, if not, what course the Crown intends to pursue?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET), in reply, said, that Mary M'Mahon was recently convicted at Cork of a murder committed at Limerick, the cause having been removed into the Queen's Bench, and the venue changed from Limerick to Cork. It was true that the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin was equally divided as to the validity of the verdict, and the junior Judge having withdrawn his judgment pro forma, judgment was arrested. He believed also that some expressions fell from some members of the Court in favour of speeding a Writ of Error; but the Attorney General for Ireland having carefully considered all the circumstances, and having consulted with the Law Officers of the Crown in England, had decided that this was not a case in which a Writ of Error should be brought. He might add that it was intended to prosecute the woman for a robbery committed at the same time as the murder.

IRISH CHURCH ACT—CLAUSE 25— PRESERVATION OF NATIONAL MONUMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he would state to the House who has been appointed by the Board of Works to superintend the preservation of the National Monuments in Ireland; what has been his profession, and whether he has made the ancient architecture of Ireland a subject of previous study; and, whether the Chief Secretary will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Instruction under which the officer is to act?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in reply, said, that the hon. Gentleman was probably not aware that this matter was under the control of the Treasury, and not of the Irish Government. An architect by profession had been appointed to superintend the preservation of national monuments in Ireland. He could not say whether a copy of the instruction given to this officer had been laid on the Table; but his duty would be to preserve the national monuments, and not to restore them.

IRISH FISHERIES—GALWAY. QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in "The Galway Vindicator," that the inspectors of fisheries have long ago made their recommendations as to the distribution of the portion of the Reproductive Loan Fund set apart for the fishermen on the coast of Galway; and, whether the fund will be made available in time for the autumn fishing?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in reply, said, the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries began to make recommendations in May last, and had continued to do so till the present time. The remainder of their recommendations would soon be forwarded to the Office of Public Works. He was informed by the Office of Public Works that a Circular would shortly be issued with reference to the distribution of the fund, and that upon the necessary forms being filled up, money would be advanced to the fishermen in a month.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—CASE OF JOHN SLATOR.—QUESTION.

MR. R. POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the case of John Slator, recently acquitted at the Commission Court in Dublin of a criminal assault on his own daughter, and to the reported remarks, as reported in "The Freeman's Journal," of one of the jurors and of the Judges:—

"Mr. Justice Barry said, 'He could not characterize the proceeding but as a failure of justice. A juror suggested that they should append to their verdict a statement to the effect that the indictment had been carelessly prepared. Mr. Baron Dowse asked whether the Attorney General was aware, when the indictment was being framed, that a woman could not be examined against her husband in a criminal case, and added it was a serious miscarriage of justice, and if the Attorney General did not know the law in the case he ought to have known it;'"

whether the Report is substantially correct; and, whether any steps have been taken or are intended to be taken to secure an efficient management of criminal prosecutions?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that this was one of those cases which not unfrequently happened in which evidence given at the trial differed from that given upon the information. There were three counts in the indictment against the prisoner. The first two were for assault upon a child under 12 years of age, and the third was for an indecent assault, without regard to the age of the child. No evidence could be adduced at the trial which satisfied the Court that the child was under 12 years of age, and it had since been ascertained that the child was absolutely over 12. It appeared by the information with regard to the third count that the child was not a consenting party, but upon her cross-examination it appeared that she was so. Therefore the count for an indecent assault could not be sustained. There was no failure of justice with regard to this particular trial. With regard to the remarks attributed to Mr. Baron Dowse upon the occasion, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) held in his hand a letter from that learned Baron, from which it appeared that he did not use the words—"If the Attorney General did not know the law in the case he ought to have known it." Baron Dowse was, of course, aware that the duty of the Attorney General was merely to decide in cases of this kind whether a prosecution should be instituted or not, and that the form of the indictment and the future proceedings in any particular case were entrusted to two gentlemen—who in this case happened to be Mr. Murphy and Mr. O'Brien—who were universally admitted to be thoroughly capable of fulfilling their duties, and had been appointed to their offices by the late Government. He might also quote from Mr. Baron Dowse's letter that learned Judge's opinion with regard to the capabilities of these gentlemen. Mr. Baron Dowse said—

"I may add—and in this I have the assent of my colleague Mr. Justice Barry—that at the last very heavy commission, as a rule, the prosecutions in Green Street were remarkably well conducted by the experienced solicitor and able counsel who represent the Crown."

Other Judges had at different times expressed the same opinion. On the whole case he would remark that there had been no failure of justice, and that whatever might have occurred the Attorney General had been most unjustly blamed for a matter which was not under his own control, and in which he was not in any degree responsible.

MR. R. POWER asked, whether Mr. Justice Barry did not say that he could not characterize the proceedings except as a failure of justice?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought that might very likely have been the case, and he would explain why. The learned justice and the jury were at the time under the impression, which was afterwards disproved, that the child was under 12 years old.

KINGDOM OF ITALY—THE MURDER OF MR. HINDE, NEAR NAPLES.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can give any information as to the state of the investigation into the murder of the late Mr. Hinde near Naples, and the steps taken on behalf of Her Majesty's Government to secure the conviction of the murderer?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I can assure my hon. Friend that the murder of Mr. Hinde near Naples in March last has from the first engaged the earnest attention and solicitude of Mr. Calvert, our Consul at Naples, and that of Sir Augustus Paget, at Rome; and Her Majesty's Government have every reason to believe that the Italian Government have acted with promptitude in doing their best to bring to justice the perpetrators of this very atrocious crime. Soon after the murder the gardener in Mr. Hinde's service was arrested, as well as his wife and two lads who worked in the garden. The evidence did not justify the detention of the woman or the lads, so they have been released. But a prosecution has been instituted against the gardener, who will be tried, it is expected, in a few days. We have been in communication with the Treasury upon the subject, and it has been arranged that any reasonable sum which may be required to secure the conviction of the guilty parties above what the family of Mr. Hinde have contributed shall be paid from the public funds.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT —VETERINARY DEPARTMENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—QUESTION.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he would have any objection to publish in "The Gazette" the weekly returns in each county of all contagious and infectious diseases, except foot and mouth disease, included in "The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869;" and, if he could state when the Annual Report of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council will be ready for publication?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, in compliance with my hon. Friend's suggestions, the Lord President has already directed that the Returns asked for shall be published weekly in The London Gazette. The whole of the Report of the Veterinary Department for the year 1874 is in the hands of the printers, the greater part of it has been revised, and it will be ready for publication shortly.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS
—THE EXETER ENDOWED SCHOOLS SCHEME.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in reference to the "Exeter Endowed Schools Scheme," it is true that that scheme was signed and approved by Lord Lyttelton and Mr. H. J. Roby, under date 22nd May 1874; and that, after it was so signed and approved, an important addition was made to Clause 72; and, if such addition was so made, if he would explain to the House at what date, on whose suggestion, and with what object was it made?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I am somewhat troubled by the form of the Question, but I will answer it as satisfactorily as I can. "The Exeter Endowed Schools Scheme" was forwarded to the Committee of Council on Education with the signatures of Lord Lyttelton and Mr. Roby attached to it, as appears in the Parliamentary Paper of the 22nd of May, 1874. Since that time various objections have been made to it, which, under the Act of 1873, the Committee of Council was bound to consider. Some of the changes proposed by the objectors were agreed to by the Committee of Council, and others were rejected, and after a time the scheme was approved by the Lord President of the Council. Under the Act it must lie upon the Table for two months, and during that time it is competent for any Member to move the rejection of the scheme. If such should be the case, I shall be happy on the part of the Government to explain the reasons which led to the changes that have been made in the scheme; but it would not be in accordance with the usage of the Committee of Council for me to state, in answer to a Question, all the details which the hon. Member requests me to mention. I may add that the course pursued in this case with regard to the scheme which has been laid upon the Table is the same one which has been adopted with regard to others.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to know whether the scheme which had been laid upon the Table, and to which the names of Lord Lyttelton and Mr. Roby were attached, was the scheme signed by Lord Lyttelton and Mr. Roby, and approved by them?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I think there can be no doubt whatever about that, because the original scheme was published in the locality; and this scheme is different from that, as an alteration has been made in it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am afraid, then, I must ask what that alteration is.

VISCOUNT SANDON: I think, with the indulgence of the House, it is hardly fitting to enter into an argument on the subject now.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not ask my noble Friend for any argument in favour of the alteration; but, inasmuch as it is before the House as a scheme signed by those two gentlemen, and it appears—it may be through some mistake, but, at any rate, it so happens—that the scheme which appears to have been signed by them was really not signed by them. I ask what is the addition to the scheme?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The simplest thing would be to lay the whole scheme on the Table, and that, I think, would be a very desirable thing. The signatures of the Commissioners are attached to this scheme because my right hon. Friend objected last year to the practice of introducing schemes without the names of the Commissioners being attached to them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am sorry to detain the House, but my objection was that the Commissioners should be made to appear as attaching their signatures to a portion of the scheme which they did not sign.

VISCOUNT SANDON: The simplest plan will be to lay upon the Table the alteration which has been made. There is no mystery whatever about it.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I wish to ask the noble Viscount whether the Education Department have not under the Act of 1873 power to alter a scheme after it has been proposed by the Commissioners who are now superseded?

MR. HORSMAN: What my right hon. Friend wishes to know, I presume, is whether the signature of the Commissioners is appended to that part of the scheme which has been altered since they signed it originally.

VISCOUNT SANDON: There is no doubt whatever that the Committee of Council has power to alter a scheme under the circumstances to which my hon. Friend refers. With regard to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, I think the simplest thing will be to lay the scheme, with the alterations, on the Table, so that the House may be in a position to understand the matter fully.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the words attached to the scheme were—"We hereby signify our approval of the scheme.—(Signed) LYTTLTON and J. H. ROBY." It was stated that it was signed by the Commissioners on the 22nd of May, 1875, but long before that date they had ceased to be Commissioners. He asked the noble Lord if, under all the circumstances, it would not be the best course to withdraw the scheme and to place a fresh one before the House?

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the date given must be a clerical error. He would make inquiry of the Charity Commissioners.

MR. W. E. FORSTER gave Notice that he would take an early opportunity of asking the Speaker whether the circumstances did not require a new scheme?

ARMY — KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been directed to a report in "The Times" of June 21st, of a Deputation to the First Commissioner of Works respecting "the discreditable condition of the Kensington Road," attributed by certain residents in that neighbourhood to "the existence of the Knightsbridge Barracks and their natural associations;" and, whether he is in possession of any information proving the truth or untruth of this and other similar statements which have been recently made reflecting on the character and conduct of the three regiments of Household Cavalry while quartered in Hyde Park?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that his attention had been very much directed to this subject, since the deputation referred to. First of all he received a letter from the clergyman at Windsor who had care of the Household Troops, and who was indignant at the charge made against them, as he knew them to be incapable of the conduct attributed to them. He had likewise received many communications on the subject from the commanding officers, the police, and others, and it was universally stated that the conduct of the Household Cavalry at the Knightsbridge Barracks was altogether unexceptionable. No complaints had been made about them by the police or any other persons. Their officers were extremely strict, and they did not frequent any bad house at all. They did not go to houses in the immediate neighbourhood, which he was afraid were kept up by customers of a totally different kind. No complaints on military grounds had been made to the Commander-in-Chief respecting these soldiers, nor was there any foundation for the assertion that they were the cause of any discreditable associations in the neighbourhood of Kensington Gore. His noble Friend the First Commissioner of Works desired him to repudiate in the strongest language the idea that he said anything injurious to the character of the soldiers in these barracks. As to the Cavalry in the Regent's Park Barracks, no complaint had been made of them and no complaint had been made respecting the conduct of the Cavalry in the streets of Windsor. Therefore, he thought the House would agree with him that the officers and soldiers had good reason to feel aggrieved at having imputations cast upon them which they in no way deserved.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to letters addressed to him soliciting the return to the senders of various original documents purporting to show that the convict Castro is Roger Tichborne, Whether he will be good enough to state why such letters are not acknowledged or replied to; and, what are the objections, if any, to return such documents to the senders, seeing that the Right honourable gentleman has declared it to be his intention not to take any action thereon, or allow them to be published or inspected by Members of this House?

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I am afraid, Sir, I have already given an answer to that Question more than once—namely, that it is the invariable practice of the Home Office that documents sent there have to be registered and then become public property, and are never returned to the persons sending them.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was not aware that the right hon. Gentleman had answered the Question before. What he would ask the right hon. Gentleman was, whether he still persisted in refusing permission to inspect those documents? ["Order."]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that the Question having been put and answered cannot be put a second time.

ARMY—SHORT SERVICE.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is in a position to state the general nature of the arrangement to render the system of short service in the Army compatible with the conditions of service in India?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that he had not yet come to any conclusion on the subject, but that he proposed to confer with the India Office with a view to placing the matter on a more satisfactory footing.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL TEACHERS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. WHITWELL rose to move—

"That the case of the Teachers now serving in inspected Elementary Schools in England and Wales, and who were employed as recognised Teachers under Government inspection from the 21st December 1846, to the 6th of August 1851, and of those who were so employed from the latter date to the issue of the Revised Code in 1861, claims the consideration of the House of Commons, not only with regard to the Teachers themselves, but also in the interests of education."

In bringing the subject before the House he admitted that the Government had taken it into careful consideration, and had made some improvements in the position of the teachers to which his Motion referred. But there were still some points to which he thought the attention of the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) might be usefully directed. According to the Minute which had been placed in the hands of Members that morning various changes were being introduced that would impose on the teachers serious restrictions. One had reference to the number of years during which a teacher must have been engaged in an elementary school to entitle him to participate in the advantages of the Minute; whilst another excluded from consideration the claims of teachers whose salary had for seven years been £120 per annum. He trusted that such alterations would be made as would entitle these persons to have their claims for pensions considered. All that he wanted was that teachers who were fairly entitled from length of service should have their claims to pensions considered in competition with those of others. There were many teachers with salaries just above £120 per annum who would wish to retire from age and ill-health, and the managers of the schools were ready to supplement their pensions if the Government would only grant them £20 a-year each.

MR. FORSYTH said, he was extremely glad to find from a Paper on the Table that the Government had done nearly all that was desired. He joined in asking the Vice President of the Council to re-consider that part of the new Minute which limited pensions to those male teachers whose salaries did not amount to £120 per annum, and female teachers whose salaries did not exceed £60 per annum. He suggested that every case should be taken upon its merits, and that a hard-and-fast line should not be drawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was glad to receive the new Minute that morning, because it was one that the late Government would have issued if they had remained in office. The Select Committee who considered this subject came to the conclusion that these teachers had no legal claim, but that it was one deserving of consideration. Since then fresh evidence had come out; strong speeches were made in both Houses of Parliament at the time the original Minutes were passed, and it was impossible to read them without feeling that the teachers might fairly have inferred there was an expectation that pensions would be granted. A small pension might meet the justice of the case in many hard and deserving instances. He supported the appeal of the hon. Members for Kendal and Marylebone that the Vice President would not fetter himself by the restrictions laid down in this Minute, and feel that by the letter of the Minute he was precluded by a technical difficulty from meeting deserving cases.

MR. PEASE thanked the noble Lord the Vice President for doing this substantial act of justice. If these persons had not a legal claim, they certainly had a strong moral claim on the Government.

MR. HOLT, while expressing his satisfaction at the course taken by the Government, thought that the Minute on the subject was somewhat too restricted, and might be extended with advantage.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BUTLER - JOHNSTONE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the desirability of introducing physical education in the Public Elementary Schools of the country, said:—Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the desirability of dealing with the subject in the manner indicated by my Notice, and to say that I think it is time that something of the sort were done. When the education of the people of this country was first seriously undertaken, so many difficulties—social, religious, and financial difficulties—confronted its first promoters, that it was not to be expected that they should burden themselves with more than they could manage, and they wisely confined their attention to the inculcation of reading, writing, and arithmetic. But these early difficulties are now happily surmounted, and universal compulsory education is fairly established in the country. The time seems therefore arrived when we may ask ourselves whether something essential has not been omitted, and if we think that it has, then with as much speed and as small a cost as possible, to endeavour to repair the omission. Now, taking all the wants of the people of this country into consideration, I think it may fairly be maintained that physical education is at least as necessary as intellectual education; in some respects more. In all these cases where physical power is impaired by disease and neglect, and by ignorance of the elementary rules of hygiene, some knowledge, some elementary knowledge of these laws, with practical rules deduced from these laws, is at least as necessary as reading, writing, and arithmetic. But I do not wish to put physical education into competition with these subjects; it is not a rival but an auxiliary, and if rightly understood, and rightly and wisely applied, a very valuable auxiliary. Now, no one can have studied the statistics which I am about to lay before the House without being convinced that all is not satisfactory in the physique of the people of the country. Side by side with great stamina and splendid physical development, we find the following facts:—Out of 1,000 recruits, on an average of four years, 408 are rejected for imperfect physical development. Out of 5,500 boys applying for service in the Navy, a good deal more than one-half are rejected on the same grounds; out of 530 men applying for railway employment 290 are rejected—92 for insufficient breadth of chest—in a metropolitan suburban workhouse visited by an eminent London physician, 23 per cent of the children under 15 were found suffering from chronic diseases. In several ragged schools visited by the same gentleman, 50 per cent of the children are found affected with deformation of the spine, chest complaints, and strumous diseases. And a large manufacturer in Nelson Street, Liverpool, says it is a piteous sight to see the little girls with crooked spines and awry necks who come to his counter for payment on Saturday nights. Most people will agree that there is an eloquence of a melancholy sort in these statistics, and if we can do anything to remedy the evil complained of, it is our duty to make the attempt. It is scarcely necessary to dwell on the advantages which would result to the country from improving the physique of the population. Increased physical power means increased value of productive work; a decrease in depravity and disease means a decrease in poor rates and police rates, for ill-health and disease are too often causes of misery, poverty, and crime. But it is so obvious that the sum total of the happiness and well-being of the community would be augmented if disease, mortality, and depravity were diminished, that it seems like an insult to people's understandings to dwell on these obvious advantages, and I prefer asking the attention of the House to the question of the practicability of attaining these desirable results. Now what is physical education? Unfortunately gymnastics, drill, athletics, and what goes in genteel girls' schools by the ambitious title of calisthenics, are too often jumbled up in people's minds under the common appellation of physical education, and when one talks of introducing physical education into boys' schools, the drill sergeant rises up before men's eyes as the embodied emblem of physical education. Now no one, Sir, has a greater respect than I have for the drill sergeant. He is a great, a useful, and even a solemn institution. I should like to see every able-bodied man in England pass through his reforming hands. But that is another and a totally different question from the one which I am discussing. You only degrade physical education, and defeat the very object which you wish to attain of preparing the whole male population for military service, by calling in prematurely the aid of the drill sergeant, in the case of children who require a whole course of preparatory training in order to make them of the best use in the drill sergeant's hands. You must work your cotton into yarn before it can be woven into cloth. By physical education I distinctly mean the inculcation of some sound, though elementary, principles of hygiene, combined with the practice of simple, though scientifically devised, exercises founded on sound physiological and anatomical principles. Now these two things ought to go together. Sound theory and wholesome practice are here, as in everything else, closely connected together. With reference to the first branch I hardly think its utility will be contested. Among otherwise well-educated people such unfortunate ignorance on the subject of hygiene prevails that we cannot be surprised if in the masses of the people the grossest and most unfortunate delusions on the subject are rife. It is all very well passing Public Health Bills, Pollution of Rivers Bills, and Food and Drugs Bills—an antecedent condition to the utility of all such measures is that their machinery should be loyally and willingly worked by people possessed of the conviction of their value and utility. Now the value of fresh air, pure water, and wholesome food, is scarcely appreciated at all by the great majority of the people, and until you have opened their eyes, your labour will be more or less thrown away. With reference to the second branch of my definition, I think I can best illustrate my meaning by referring to what other nations have done on the subject. The lead in these matters has undoubtedly been taken by Sweden, and that owing to the genius of a man who was neither a politician nor a drill sergeant, but a poet and a patriot—I mean the great Ling. Ling's idea was a patriotic idea; he wished to raise the small population of his native country, by the physical training of each individual Swede, into a position to resist the encroachments of its dangerous neighbours, at that time seriously menacing its independence and very existence. With this view, he invented a thoroughly rational system of gymnastics, founded on physiological, anatomical, and mechanical laws, and which he divided into educational, military, medical, and athletic gymnastics. In 1813 he induced the Swedish Government to establish a large central institution at Stockholm for the training of teachers, who, after they had pursued a theoretical and practical course of instruction, and had passed an examination, were diffused throughout the different schools of the country; and there can be no doubt that much of the fine physical appearance of the population of Sweden is owing to this widely diffused early physical training. In 1845, the Prussian Government sent a Major Rothstein into Sweden to report about another matter, and he was so much impressed with this Swedish system of gymnastics that, on his return, he persuaded the Prussian Government to adopt it, and now not only throughout Prussia, but throughout the whole of Germany, and notably in Württemberg and Saxony, the system is adopted, and central institutions for the training of teachers are established at Berlin, Stuttgart, Dresden, and other places. Italy, too, has not been backward, and has paid particular attention to an important branch of the subject—namely, the physical training of the girls. Hungary, too, in consequence of the initiative of the late able Minister of Education, Baron Ottoos, has made physical training compulsory in all her schools. Russia, too, after having long adopted physical training in her military and naval academies, has now instituted it for all the primary and secondary schools of the country. I have mentioned the case of Saxony. I wish now to call the particular attention of the House to the case of Saxony. Saxony is a manufacturing country, and here, as in the manufacturing districts of Prussia, it was found that there was such a deterioration of physique that the numbers in the conscription lists did not keep pace with the increase of the population. But since physical education has been made compulsory this falling off has been arrested and no more complaints have been heard. I think this fact is well worthy of the consideration of a manufacturing people like ourselves. Indeed, go into the manufacturing districts and what do we see? Little children whose quick brains and stunted frames seem to require rather physical than intellectual fostering, and where physical education ought scarcely to hold a secondary place in any wise system of education. Now contrast what has been done by other nations with what we have been doing in this respect. Except a few unscientific attempts at drill, absolutely nothing has been done for the physical education of the people of this country. One reason of this undoubtedly is that in no country in the world is so much done in the way of athletics and outdoor sports as is done in England. But I would call the attention of the House to this fact—that it is not among the classes who habitually practice athletic sports that I am especially advocating the introduction of physical education. There are our public schools, our higher and middle-class schools, the Universities and Colleges of the country. But where are the athletic sports in the crowded alleys of our large towns? It is no answer to the complaint that large classes are deprived of the advantages of physical exercises to say that other classes are devoted to those exercises! The fact is England is a nation of contrasts. Side by side with vast accumulations of wealth there are ugly patches of misery and wretchedness. Side by side with splendid physical development there is no physical education at all. It is to remedy this state of things, to raise the physical level of the whole population, that I am advocating to-day the cause of physical education in the schools of the country. Before I sit down I wish to call the particular attention of the House to an experiment on a small scale, of this very thing which I am advocating, which has been tried through the public spirit of an eminent London physician, Dr. Roth, of Wimpole Street, who has devoted so much attention to this subject, and with remarkably successful results. Dr. Roth instructed gratuitously a number of female teachers who had been sent to him by the Educational Union and other societies, by giving them lectures and teaching them Ling's free educational exercises; and after a course of a few months they were enabled to instruct their schools in what they had learnt; and at the present moment some 400 or 500 girls are receiving physical training through this public spirited movement on the part of Dr. Roth, and what is important to note is that these teachers write to Dr. Roth and tell him that they find their efficiency as teachers in other respects decidedly increased by the physical training which they are able to give their pupils. Now, Sir, it had once been my intention to move for a Royal Commission to consider the whole subject—the necessity for the introduction of physical education and the best means of introducing it—but I am so convinced that a cause like this can only be advanced by the Government taking the initiative in the matter, that I should be only too glad to leave it in their hands, to see if they cannot further the cause of physical education in the schools of England.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870)
—COMPULSORY ATTENDANCE—CASE OF MRS. MARKS.—RESOLUTION.

LORD ESLINGTON, in rising to call attention to the case of Mrs. Marks, as reported in "The Times" of the 4th day of May, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the cordial co-operation of School Boards and Boards of Guardians within their respective districts is essential to the just and beneficial exercise of the powers conferred upon School Boards of enforcing attendance at school upon children of the labouring poor," said, in bringing this subject before the House he had not come down to run a-muck against school boards, or to blame school-board officials; the circumstances of which he was about to complain arose out of the execution of the laws. He had to point out a distinct grievance which required a remedy at the hands of the House, and he should suggest a remedy which he thought at once simple, reasonable, and efficacious. The case of Mrs. Marks occurred in the City Division of the London School Board. Her husband had been in the employment of a respectable person at the East End of London for 12 years. At the end of that time he was seized with paralysis. For six months she maintained him and three children by her labour. In November last he got worse, became a hopeless lunatic, and was transferred to a lunatic asylum at Stoke. Mrs. Marks was soon afterwards confined of twins; one of them died, and the other required the greatest care to rear. The eldest of her children was a girl of about 11 years. Mrs. Marks got 5s. a-week and four loaves from the parish. The rent of her room was 3s. 3d. per week. Her baby was ordered a large allowance of milk as necessary to life, and it cost weekly 4s. 4½d. The school fee was 4d. per week. That made 8s. in outgoings from the small earnings of Mrs. Marks. To support herself and children she had to work hard all day from 8 in the morning till 8 o'clock at night, her eldest daughter remaining at home to attend to the delicate infant. In April last the school-board officer called at the house. Mrs. Marks was not at home; the officer said to the girl—"You little beggar, you are getting your mother into fine trouble. I have just seen the relieving officer. Your relief will be stopped, and you will all be turned over to the workhouse." This case was not an isolated one, but only a specimen of several cases. One of these cases he would mention. It was that of the widow of a Frenchman who was for years manager of a white lead manufactory, and resided at Lewis-ham. The man was for seven years before his death afflicted with a disease of the brain, and during that time his wife maintained the whole family, consisting of her husband, herself, and four children. Her sight failing somewhere about the time of her husband's death, the poor woman was driven to washing and in-door work in order to save her children and herself from the necessity of going into the workhouse. Her rent was 3s. per week, and the Guardians had been compelled to stop her weekly allowance of 4s. 6d., the law being imperative that no out-door relief should be granted to people who, having children of school age, failed to send them to school. Even zealous educationists would admit the hardship of this case, but would urge that it was one of the incidents of a compulsory system, and could not be avoided. To such people he would say that the imposition of compulsory education, though perfectly legal, was a difficult and delicate matter, and could not be successfully carried out, unless supported by public opinion. Further, he would say that public opinion, high and low, was deeply stirred by occurrences such as this; and if their occurrence had the effect of creating in the minds of the upper classes—between whom and the lowest classes there had always been a feeling of sympathy—a distrust of the compulsory system, how much more likely was that feeling to be deepened in the minds of the poorer classes, who were closely affected by the action of the law, and who, at the present moment, were sullenly and silently submissive to its provisions. He therefore asked the House seriously to consider whether it was not possible to provide a remedy for this state of things. The law provided as a condition of the granting of out-door relief to parents that all children between 5 and 13 should receive elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and it also provided that the Guardians should give such further relief, if any, as might be necessary for such purpose. What he would suggest, therefore, was that, if necessary, the law should be so altered as to enable the Guardians to make grants sufficient to free the parents' labour and to enable them to provide substitutes, in the performance of household and such-like duties, for the children whom the law carried away from their homes. The cost of doing this might seem to be large; but, as education was in time to extinguish pauperism, he could not help thinking it would be money well expended. The school boards themselves were in difficulty on this point. Mr. Francis Peek—a distinguished member of the London School Board, and a relative of an hon. Member of that House—had stated that, being elected to administer a law which said that attendance must be compulsory, the school boards felt themselves in great difficulty when cases such as the present arose. The law was frequently broken in such cases; but it was not a proper or satisfactory position for boards to be placed in. In the Act of 1870 certain exceptions were admitted—namely, where children were prevented by sickness or any other unavoidable cause of absence, that should be deemed a reasonable excuse for not attending school. Why should not a school board be invested with the discretion to say that the nursing of an infant sister or brother was an unavoidable cause? This would meet many cases; and an alternative suggestion which would meet others was, that the Guardians should have the power of giving in relief, in addition to the school pence, a sum sufficient to enable the parent to send an infant to a temporary home. That would be an investment bearing high and valuable interest. He implored the House to consider this matter for the sake of reconciling the working classes to compulsory education; for if these cases of hardship continued to occur, we should raise an opposition which it would be difficult to cope with. When the Act first came into operation such cases did not occur, but when the officers of the school boards began to sweep up the waifs and strays they arose in great numbers, and the longer a system of this kind continued the tendency increased on the part of the officers to perform their duty in a perfunctory manner, and sweep in those waifs and strays rather in a peremptory manner, thereby augmenting the popular indignation in the courts and alleys of our great cities. In reply to a Question put by him on the 6th of May, the Vice President of the Department (Viscount Sandon) said that all children between the ages of 10 and 13 were obliged to attend school 10 hours a-week; but the London by-law required their attendance for as many hours as school was open; and he would suggest, as an alternative, that only five attendances of two hours each in the week should be required in exceptional cases, and that, if necessary, at a "night school." The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. SANDFORD seconded the Resolution, and mentioned that the Board of Guardians of Maldon had been applied to in several instances by able-bodied men for relief, in consequence of some of their children being deprived of employment through the operation of the Act of 1872. When the Local Government Board were communicated with on the subject, they replied that they considered that out-door relief when given while a man continued in employment would be relief in aid of wages, and that the proper course for Guardians to adopt in such cases would be to offer admission into the workhouse for the man and his family. He should like to know whether the moral and social progress of the population would be best promoted by having a few children less at school, or having the whole of the remainder of the family in a workhouse? A recent Return of the expenditure of the Metropolitan Board abundantly established the charges of extravagance that were made against it. Architects on the staff were paid both by fees and commissions; pupil-teachers were paid almost double what they used to receive; the salaries of teachers were better than those of curates; and there was a large staff of "visitors," who ought to be designated spies and informers. The character of the education given to pauper children by these school boards, which, as he understood, were appointed only to supplement the education of the country, would surprise many hon. Gentlemen. They were to be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, the history of England, geography, elementary drawing, music, domestic economy, algebra, and geometry. He did not think it was ever intended by the Legislature that pauper children should receive such a high-class education. He had heard of a school in Mayfair where a girl had been taken from her needlework to attend to a drawing class. Of what possible use could a knowledge of drawing be to young women intended for domestic service—except to enable them to caricature their mistresses—especially as it appeared that needlework was a branch of education in which these girls were particularly deficient, and which it was especially desirable they should be taught? Our Colonies were calling upon us to give them labourers and not clerks, and he protested against the miserable gentility inculcated upon those who were taught that it was disgraceful to work with their hands, and who were ashamed of the horny hands of manual industry. It was the sure sign of the decay of a country when its people looked down upon useful manual labour, and the sort of education he had described was certainly not that which ought to be carried out by compulsion. As to the compulsory part of the measure, it appeared to be carried to excess. Last week a poor woman named Turner was summoned by an officer of the Board for not sending her children to school. She pleaded that she had a child suffering from fever, and that the other child was kept at home to mind it. She was fined 3s., with the option of going to prison for three days. She had to go to prison. This woman was a widow, and in great distress, and what would have been her condition if the people of the house had not during her absence looked after her children? In his humble opinion, the forms of the notices given by the School Board were absolutely illegal. These notices were to the following effect:—

"Take notice that you have been guilty of a breach of the law in that you have neglected to send your child to an efficient school, whereby you have rendered yourself liable to be apprehended and brought before a magistrate."

A child might be receiving efficient instruction at home from its parents, in which case the latter would certainly not be liable to proceedings. During the last year the parents of not less than 78,000 had been harassed by these notices, of whom 6,016 had been summoned and 4,000 fined. Some of the persons summoned before a police magistrate had declared that it was their intention to expatriate themselves, and to seek a country in which such laws did not exist. He sympathized with such views; for, if they searched the statute book they would find no legislation couched in a spirit so offensive and un-English as this Education Act. Of all the despotisms and tyrannies with which men could be afflicted, there was no tyranny so oppressive, and no despotism so intolerable, as the despotism of the pedant and the tyranny of the prig.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"in the opinion of this House, the cordial co-operation of School Boards and Boards of Guardians within their respective districts is essential to the just and beneficial exercise of the powers conferred upon School Boards of enforcing attendance at school upon children of the labouring poor;"—(Lord Eslington),

—instead thereof.

MR. EVANS said, that in the days of Dr. Johnson, whom the hon. Member who had just sat down might probably regard as a pedant, the fears which he held as to the spread of education were much more common. When it was said in Dr. Johnson's presence that if children were taught they would become unfit for the duties of common life, Dr. Johnson replied that if a very few were educated they would be vain of their accomplishments. If a very few persons, he said, wore laced waistcoats, they would be vain of the distinction, but if everybody wore laced waistcoats a person ceased to be proud of it; and he argued that, in the same way, if all were educated, none would be ashamed of being engaged in menial occupations. Having been chairman of a school board for more than four years, he could bear testimony to the fact that cases like those referred to by the noble Lord (Lord Eslington) were among the most painful that came before them. It was not a question of school fees, because the school board had the power to deal with that, but it was a question affecting the earnings of the children. A woman might be left a widow, or might be deserted by her husband. If she had a family she found it convenient to keep one at home, or a child might be earning wages, and if they were stopped the whole family might have to go into the workhouse. He should be most thankful if some plan could be found by which these cases might be met. There was no doubt that the Boards of Guardians knew more of the real circumstances of the poor than the school boards, and it was very desirable that there should be a good understanding, if not some co-operation between them and the school boards. It was most desirable that these cases of hardships should not be multiplied. Among the poorest class of the population the sending of their children to school, especially on compulsion, was very distasteful, and every case of this kind tended to increase the opposition which unfortunately existed. If these cases could be met a great benefit would be conferred upon the country, and the cause of education, which everybody wished to see promoted, except perhaps the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford), would be greatly benefited.

MR. A. MILLS agreed with the hon. Member who had just spoken in the advantage of the fullest co-operation between school boards and Boards of Guardians. It was said that a medical officer of the Poor Law would not without a fee give a certificate that a child was unable to attend school. He thought the medical officer of the Poor Law ought to be instructed to give certificates of that sort, or that the school boards should pay medical officers to do so. With regard to the harshness which had been imputed to the London School Board in connection with this matter, he thought account had not been taken of the great difficulties which the Board experienced in carrying out compulsory by-laws. He believed that gross injustice would be done by enforcing the by-laws in the case, for instance, of a child who was kept at home to "mind baby," and whose parent could not afford to pay a person to do that work. In some cases the difficulty as to attendance at school was got over by an employer making arrangements by which a child in his employment could attend school in the evening. He (Mr. A. Mills) believed he had acted rightly in sanctioning such arrangements. With some persons it was necessary to deal gently, and with others firmly. A woman who had a large number of children, and allowed them to run about the streets instead of sending them to school, was called before the Board, and asked to account for her conduct. She said, in a very impudent tone—"I don't look to you for sympathy; I look to a higher power." While we were not to deal harshly, if the compulsory power were withdrawn, it would be impossible to carry out the system. He believed the Earl of Shaftesbury was mistaken in saying that the members of school boards were quite indifferent to the hardships which a too strict administration of the law would inflict on parents.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, having introduced the two Acts which had been referred to, wished to state what was his meaning and the meaning of the late Government in pressing those measures upon the House. Before he did so he would make a remark upon an observation of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The House must not suppose that in proposing an Education Bill giving a power to compel the attendance of children at school the late Government were not thoroughly conscious of the difficulty and danger of that undertaking. It would have been more difficult and more dangerous if they had not felt confident that that measure would be administered in the country with wisdom and justice. He believed that generally throughout the country the school boards had shown remarkable discretion, great industry, and sympathy with the poor in the way in which they had put into operation the two Acts in question. He was convinced that the school boards had acted with care and judgment; for if they had not done so, we should have a state of things very different from what existed. When cases of individual hardship were examined it was found that they did not always bear out the impression which was at first formed. For example, in the case of Mrs. Marks it was at first believed that she was forced to become a pauper in consequence of her child going to school, but it turned out that she had previously been in receipt of relief; and he should be very glad if hon. Members, before they took for granted that a great hardship had been inflicted, would thoroughly satisfy themselves of all the particulars of the case. It might have been expected to be a most unpopular act to interfere between the parent and his child; but, as a matter of fact, public opinion in every town in which there were compulsory by-laws was in favour of maintaining these laws. And that proved that there were not many cases of injustice and oppression in the carrying out of these Acts. He was not afraid of stating that fact, and of challenging any one in that House to contradict it. In reply to the remarks of his noble Friend, who thought that the Act of 1873 limited the power of the Guardians to give such relief as would enable a parent to send a child to school, he might state that when he framed that Act he was informed on the best authority that the Guardians were bound by the present law to give relief when there was a real want; and, consequently, if the parents were put in a position of losing in such a way that they ought to have relief the Guardians were bound to give it. It was because he was thoroughly satisfied on this point that he did not think it necessary to insert any provision in the Bill in regard to it. Cases might, indeed, arise in which a man was not a pauper, but who just managed to get on, and who would be compelled to apply for relief if he lost the wages of one or two of his children. Here, however, the question raised was not merely between the education of the child and the relief of the parent, but it was the other very important question between in-door and out-door relief; and there was a strong feeling that it was very dangerous to encourage out-door relief to able-bodied men. If he were disposed to offer any advice to the Government, it would be that they ought to deal in these cases as leniently as possible, and stretch a point in favour of out-door relief. In any event it was desirable that the children should be educated and not be left without any chance in life at all; but the parent ought not to suffer in consequence by being sent to the workhouse; and therefore he should be glad if such cases could be settled without too strict an attention to the arguments in favour of in-door as against out-door relief. He did not think that there was much objection to the terms of the noble Lord's Resolution; but he hoped that it would not be pressed on the attention of the Government, as it implied a censure on the Department. He thought that more intimate communication was required between the Education Department and the Local Government Board, with a view to their more harmonious action. His noble Friend was wrong in supposing that school boards did not already possess the power of abstaining from prosecuting when they knew the absence of a child from school was due to illness or other unavoidable cause. There was one point on which he thought the Local Government Board went too far. A letter had been sent to them asking whether they would consider that the temporary severe illness of a parent was such a case as might excuse a child from attending school. He thought it was rather a hasty reply on the part of the Board, when they answered that they did not think so. In the case of a permanent illness it would of course be different, for there they had to choose between the whole future of the child and the parents' need. He regretted the tone of the remarks of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford). As to the complaint about the salaries given to teachers, he might observe that any attempt to lower them must result in inefficient education and the waste of the public money. For his own part, he rejoiced to find that the salaries of the teachers were rising throughout the country. There never was any expenditure more likely to benefit the working classes than that which would procure an abler and better paid body of teachers for their children. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think the head masters of our largest schools only had the salaries of curates; but he might have compared them to the income of Bishops. At the close of his speech the hon. Gentleman sympathized with those who said they would expatriate themselves rather than submit to a law which compelled parents to educate their children. He thought, on the other hand, that a great many persons would be glad to banish themselves from the country some years hence if in the meantime the children were not properly educated.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he wished, with reference to the pensions, to express his great satisfaction at the way in which Her Majesty's Government had been treated. They felt decidedly that the teachers had no positive claim to pensions; but after the debates of 1846, when the Leaders of the different parties spoke strongly on the subject, and considering the language that was held afterwards, it was felt that the teachers had a moral claim which it would be unwise for any Government to disregard. He would briefly explain why the Government adopted the scale of pensions—£6,500 a-year—laid down in 1851. The circumstance had hitherto been overlooked that the noble Lord who was President of the Council in 1851 was the late Lord Lansdowne, who in that year put the interpretation on the Minute he had himself issued in 1846. The teachers might, therefore, regard that interpretation as the proper one. The points raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) would be treated with very respectful consideration by the Government, although at present he was unable to give any pledge on the subject. He might claim for the Government a desire to do what they could to promote physical education in schools. He had every reason to believe that the substitution of military drill in place of the ordinary school drill would be attended with very advantageous results. He declined to give any pledge as to any further steps at present, as the few hours in which the children could be instructed must be spent to their best advantage. He had been asked to discourage the large sites which the London School Board were buying; but he held it was a wise expenditure of public money in a densely-crowded City to provide sufficient playgrounds for the children of the poorer classes. In those playgrounds a good deal of physical education would go on, though, perhaps, not in a cut-and-dried form. As to the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Eslington), his own feelings and those of the Government were very much in unison with them respecting the very great difficulty and delicacy of the question of overhauling the poor of London and dragging their children to school. It was, no doubt, a very painful process to drag children from the arms of unwilling parents to school. It was painful also to have to pay these domiciliary visits; and nothing but the gravest necessity—a necessity acknowledged by the people themselves—would justify the placing of such powers in the hands of the school boards. He was convinced, however, that some such powers were necessary in dealing with the population of our large cities and in grappling with the ignorance and the misery of the lowest classes there. Every other means had been tried and every other means had failed. Had his noble Friend (Lord Eslington), who drew so dark a picture, ever thought of the other side of the picture? Had he remembered that in London there was a population something like equal to that of Scotland, that 77,000 notices and 6,000 summonses had been issued, and that 200 visiting officers were at work; and had he reflected how very few complaints comparatively had been made? It was a perfect marvel that there were so few, and the fact spoke volumes for the judgment and discretion of the School Board and its officers in dealing with so varied a population and one so touchy

upon the House. Before he did so he would make a remark upon an observation of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The House must not suppose that in proposing an Education Bill giving a power to compel the attendance of children at school the late Government were not thoroughly conscious of the difficulty and danger of that undertaking. The circumstance had hitherto been overlooked that the noble Lord who was President of the Council in 1851 was the late Lord Lansdowne, who in that year put the interpretation on the Minute he had himself issued in 1846. The teachers might, therefore, regard that interpretation as the proper one. The points raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) would be treated with very respectful consideration by the Government, although at present he was unable to give any pledge on the subject. He might claim for the Government a desire to do what they could to promote physical education in schools. He had every reason to believe that the substitution of military drill in place of the ordinary school drill would be attended with very advantageous results. He declined to give any pledge as to any further steps at present, as the few hours in which the children could be instructed must be spent to their best advantage. He had been asked to discourage the large sites which the London School Board were buying; but he held it was a wise expenditure of public money in a densely-crowded City to provide sufficient playgrounds for the children of the poorer classes. In those playgrounds a good deal of physical education would go on, though, perhaps, not in a cut-and-dried form. As to the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Elington), his own feelings and those of the Government were very much in unison with them respecting the very great difficulty and delicacy of the question of overhauling the poor of London and dragging their children to school. It was, no doubt, a very painful process to drag children from the arms of unwilling parents to school. It was painful also to have to pay these domiciliary visits; and nothing but the gravest necessity—a necessity acknowledged by the people themselves—would justify the placing of such powers in the hands of the school boards. He was convinced, however, that some such powers were necessary in dealing with the population of our large cities and in grappling with the ignorance and the misery of the lowest classes there. Every other means had been tried and every other means had failed. Had his noble Friend (Lord Elington), who drew so dark a picture, ever thought of the other side of the picture? Had he remembered that in London there was a population something like equal to that of Scotland, that 77,000 notices and 6,000 summonses had been issued, and that 200 visiting officers were at work; and had he reflected how very few complaints comparatively had been made? It was a perfect marvel that there were so few, and the fact spoke volumes for the judgment and discretion of the School Board and its officers in dealing with so varied a population and one so touchy

of any interference. He could hardly imagine a more difficult task than that of visiting in all the courts and alleys of London, not backed by any policeman, even in the most horrible of these places; and yet the School Board officers discharged their duties in the most noble manner and with general discretion. As to the remedy proposed, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) had thrown great light on this question, showing that the Guardians had full licence to pay the parent the loss of the child's wages, and he had no doubt that the School Board would give a liberal interpretation to the general law on this subject. It was difficult to say whether the workhouse should be offered as an alternative in such cases; but this was a point more within the province of the President of the Local Government Board than of his own. As to the Resolution of his noble Friend, he hoped it would not be pressed, because the Government would not be justified in accepting a Resolution which seemed to cast a slur upon the action of the school boards and the Boards of Guardians. The Government felt that nothing could be more desirable than that these two bodies should co-operate well together. But the cases showing the want of such co-operation were not yet sufficient to warrant such a censure as his noble Friend proposed. His hon. Friend the Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) had taken too strong a view of what was going on in London, and he would ask him to qualify, upon reflection, the somewhat invidious epithets of "spies" and "informers" which he had used towards the officers of the school boards. Then when the hon. Gentleman asked whether the instruction given was suitable for pauper children, he (Viscount Sandon) would point out that the schools were not intended only for pauper children, but for any class of children who were not able or willing to go to other schools. He thought it a very wise expenditure of public money to set up these great buildings, to get as good teachers as possible, and to give the most thorough education they could both in the interests of the children and of the country. This seemed to be a period when public opinion was oscillating rather rapidly in a direction contrary to that from which it had started. Five years ago the Report of the Duke of Newcastle's Commission had stirred up a strong feeling in favour of education, especially the education of the out-door pauper class. Now, if we did not take care, these children would slip out of our fingers. He hoped Parliament would not, through tenderness for a few exceptional cases of hardship, forget the great object of getting rid of the taint of the pauper class in all our large towns. He was not indifferent to the sufferings of the poor in these cases; but Parliament was bound to hold the balance fairly between the school boards, who had very arduous duties to discharge, and the people with whom they had to deal.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, that, as one who had always opposed compulsory education, he was rather satisfied with the tone of the debate. He still retained his objections to compulsion, and believed this system was introduced in order to prove that the people who had advocated such an enormous amount of school accommodation should not be false prophets. There were two facts bearing upon this point taken from the last Report of the Committee of Council. School accommodation was provided for 2,861,319 children, while the average attendance was 1,678,759, so that there was an excess of school accommodation for 1,200,000 children above the number actually attending. Another fact was worth remembering. The present Government were pledged, on entering office, to take into consideration the local burdens which had been imposed upon the ratepayers; but not one word upon this point had yet been heard to-night. The course they were now pursuing was calculated to increase those burdens, which were the more severely felt as they were borne by one class of property alone. He once more warned the Government and the House against estranging those who had been the best friends of education. From 1839 to 1874 a sum of above £6,000,000 had been spent on elementary education in this country, of which no less than £4,160,000 had been voluntary contributions. Was it wise, then, to estrange persons who had acted with so much generosity? And as for the Government grants, what were they but grants out of the taxation of the country to which those very persons had contributed? In fact, the country was divided into two classes—those who paid all the expenses, and those who thought they advanced education by making speeches. That put him in mind of the nigger who said—"Preachee or floggee, but don't do both." So the persons who made speeches buttoned up their pockets and left it to others to pay the money.

MR. HARDCASTLE understood the right hon. Member for Bradford to say that it was better that a family should go into the workhouse than that a child should go without education, and the right hon. Gentleman challenged the House to dispute the assertion. He accepted the challenge, and maintained that it was a much greater evil that a family should be removed to the workhouse than that a child at an early age should go without education. There were numbers of persons who had gone without education at an early age, and who had been able to obtain it later in life. The principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman was, he believed, an altogether mistaken one, and one against which he ventured to protest.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member had hardly represented him fairly. What he had said was that he thought it the duty of the Local Government Board to encourage Guardians to stretch the amount of out-door relief in favour of the parents in such cases. As to a whole family being taken into the workhouse in order that one child should receive compulsory education, he thought that such a thing would be perfectly impossible.

LORD ESLINGTON said, that after the discussion which had taken place, and the assurance on the part of the Government that the subject would receive attention, he would not press his Motion.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HORSMAN, in rising to call attention to the subject of the Pension recently granted to Ex-Governor Eyre and to the grounds on which its amount was determined, said, that there was no question of principle or authority, but only one of technicality involved in this matter. Mr. Eyre was Governor of Jamaica for four years and four months, but before
